The amendments would assist in saving saveable marriages because once the family home is broken up in a property order or financial orders have been made, the couple in question are a long way down the road of a marriage break-up. The House has made it absolutely clear that it wants pause for thought in divorce and has voted for, in most cases, 18 months to achieve it. It would be strange if it were possible in all circumstances after just three months for couples to start the machinery that will effectively break up their marriage.

This modest pair of amendments provide for three additional months, making six months, before the final property or financial order can be negotiated—subject to a string of let-outs. The Conservative Family Campaign's legal advisers say that those let-outs will probably apply in the majority of cases. There will be a let-out in cases that are uncontested and in which the court rules that exceptional circumstances make that just and reasonable—and the courts are only too willing to allow exceptional circumstances. None the less, in the residue of cases where divorce is contested and there are no special circumstances, people will be required to reflect for six months before they set their decision in concrete. That can only be a good thing and in line with the wishes of the House—which voted for a much longer period for divorce. I urge the House to support both amendments, which would halt the machinery of divorce a little longer.

Mr. Boateng: We well understand what motivates the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) in tabling the amendments. In the real world, however, it is not possible for the parties to be held, as it were, frozen in suspended animation while the world goes on around them. That is not how it happens in the divorce process. As we have consistently said, we need to intervene early by pathways to reconciliation. Once those pathways have been explored, there is no point in freezing the machinery any further. If reconciliation is not possible, in the children's interests, the impulse must be to move quickly to agreement in relation to property and to children.

Therefore, we will with regret, but absolute certainty vote against the amendments. They do not promote reconciliation or assist the process. On the contrary, they present yet another element of complexity that will create only uncertainty and do harm. We will oppose the amendments.

Mr. Brazier rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. Brazier: With the leave of the House,

Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. I know that the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) was seeking to intervene, but, as the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) had already sat down, the situation cannot arise.

Mr. Streeter: With the leave of the House, I have noted carefully what the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) has said. He is wrong.

Mr. Brazier: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Streeter: Of course.

Mr. Brazier: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene. The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) has effectively made a case for abridging the total divorce process. I ask the House to think what possible logic there is in having a total divorce process that takes 18 months, but, if people want, in setting it all in concrete in every case after three months.

Mr. Streeter: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The amendments are modest and sensible and I urge my colleagues to support them.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed: No. 120, in page 46, line 14, at end insert—

'(1A) No financial provision order, other than an interim order, may be made under section 22A above before the end of the first three months of the period for reflection and consideration, unless—

(a) it is an order in the terms applied for to which the other party agrees; or

(b) it takes effect, in accordance with subsection (1), before the making of a divorce order or separation order, and the court is satisfied—

(i) that there are exceptional circumstances, and

(ii) that it would be just and reasonable for the order to be made earlier.'.—[Mr. Brazier.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Cornton Vale Prison (Suicides)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

11.52 pm

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): I am privileged to have this debate on suicides at Cornton Vale prison. The latest case concerned a young constituent of mine, Angela Bollan, aged 19.

I well remember the evening of Friday 26 April. I was organising a dance in my constituency when I was telephoned by the media at 6 pm to be told that one of my young constituents had committed suicide. I know her parents, Jim and Ann Bollan, very well. I went to visit them that evening to offer my condolences. It was no surprise that, when I visited them, they were devastated, distraught and numb at what had happened. They kept asking why it had happened to their daughter.

Angela was a bubbly teenager. Her mother told me that she had telephoned her the previous day. She said that Angela was a vibrant 19-year-old girl with an outgoing personality who never dwelt on problems or held grudges. She saw the good side of everyone and could with ease bridge the generation gap with her elders.On the day she died, she wrote a letter to her parents in the usual upbeat terms. She was looking forward to release. Her parent said that her letter stated:

"she had just been to the gym, telling us she had her hair cut and styled and asking us to bring some clothes up later that week."

Her parents cannot accept Angela's death, and feel that there is culpability on the part of the Scottish Prison Service for her death.

It is important to remember that Angela was on remand in Cornton Vale prison, and that the issue of remand prisoners in Scotland should be subjected to increasing focus by the Government. In Scotland, the number of such prisoners in recent years has increased. In any one year, 20 per cent. of the 5,500 Scottish prison population are on remand, and between 1990 and 1994 there was a staggering increase of 35 per cent. in the number of prisoners held on remand. In 1990, there were 771 people in that category, and by 1994 the figure had risen to 1,015.

I have spoken to Clive Fairweather, Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons in Scotland, and I know that he is concerned about the number of prisoners on remand. Among such prisoners there is a prevalence of mental disorder and drug and alcohol dependency. I should like to quote a parliamentary answer by a Home Office Minister that was given to a colleague. It states:

"researchers from the Institute of Psychiatry recently undertook for the Prison Service a study aimed principally at measuring the prevalence of mental disorder amongst the remand population in England and Wales. They considered that 66 per cent. of the adult males, 53 per cent. of the young men and 77 per cent. of the women in a large and broadly representative sample could be diagnosed as suffering from some form of mental disorder, a term which includes in this context harmful or dependent substance misuse."—[Official Report, 18 April 1996; Vol. 275, c. 566.]

I do not think that the situation is any different in Scotland.

My young constituent, Angela Bollan, was drug-dependent, but, with parental help and encouragement, she was making every attempt to overcome that. On the day of her funeral, the minister who conducted it, the Rev. Ian Millar, in an eloquent homily, said that there was little doubt that, of late, Rainbow house—that is the drug unit to which Angela went in Glasgow—was an immense influence in her life. He said:

"It was her solace and there she made so many very special friends. There she found love that asked no questions. Love that accepted and love that made no judgments. There she made the first of those faltering 12 steps to health."

The minister went on to widen the issue of the problem that confronted Angela and many other young people. He commented that, in our community, in Dumbarton and the Vale of Leven area—it is no different in many other communities—

"many hundreds of good and decent children are thrown on to the scrapheap of unemployment. The future to them seems devoid of any worth and meaning. Is it any wonder that many seek alternatives which might lift the gloom even if only for a moment."

He went on:

"I see a metamorphosis before my eyes. That catastrophic change which occurs when the bright and smiling youngsters of the primary school realise that their hopes and dreams of early years cannot be fulfilled. Despite the positive efforts of the school to promote their self-esteem, cynicism enters their soul and they give up on the system."

He mentioned the anger and the affront that that caused. It causes anger because he and other people in the community, and her parents, thought that Angela might have been saved from the demons that haunted her, and saved from herself within the prison system.

I am not here to blame the Cornton Vale staff, because I have visited the prison and seen for myself the good efforts that have been made there. The system is to blame—it dehumanises.

In the previous year, another young constituent of mine—an 18-year-old called Gerry Deary—committed suicide in Greenock prison. I visited his parents and relatives in their home on the following Saturday. His uncle told me that, if the authorities had allowed Gerry's relatives to visit him and tell him to wisen up, not to be so silly, and to prepare himself to come home soon, they could have done something for him. But they were separated from him for a vital few days, and never had that opportunity.

The fatal accident inquiries into the other deaths in Cornton Vale—those into Arlene Elliot and Kelly Holland—have highlighted the deficiencies. I will not go into the details of the cases, but it is obvious that there were faults in communication both within and outside the prison, and in the expertise of prison officers. In one case, a psychiatrist—Dr. Hunter—went to see Arlene Elliot, but he was not allowed into the prison because his visit coincided with the tea break of the prison officers. That matter was referred to by Sheriff Principal John Maguire in his fatal accident inquiry report.

Dr. Kevin Power and Professor Gunn have been commissioned by the Scottish Prison Service to look at the deficiencies in identification, communication and care, and they have made a number of recommendations. I have had the opportunity to see the bare recommendations, but not the report. I want the Minister to focus on the recommendations, and give us an assurance that something is now happening.

That is why I support the plea from my constituents Jim and Ann Bollan for a public inquiry and full disclosure. Alarm bells are ringing: there have been four suicides in Cornton Vale over a 10-month period. There were 16 suicides in Scottish prisons in 1994, 10 in 1995, and this year to date there have been four. That contrasts with a yearly average of 6.5 over the previous 10 years. Something is going wrong.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): My hon. Friend has raised the very statistics that he and I have discussed, which highlight what I call the explosion of suicides in Scottish prisons. Is not the lack of communication between the medical practitioners and the custodial officers at the root of many of the suicides of people who are infirm, psychologically disturbed and not supervised properly?

Mr. McFall: That is correct, and Professor Gunn in particular has addressed that matter. The service needs increasing expertise and resources. If the Government are to take people's liberty away from them, they have an obligation to ensure that they are cared for within prison. I can offer a way forward in a number of areas to the Minister.

First, I refer to the issue of drug offenders. Most of the young girls in Cornton Vale and other prisons are there for the most petty offences. During my visit, I met a young girl who had broken bail three times. I asked her what her original offence had been, and was told that she had stolen a £40 jumper from Marks and Spencer to feed her drug habit.

The question has to be asked—is prison the proper place to put young individuals with a drug dependency? Is there not a better community alternative? Could they be sent to an intensive treatment clinic as an alternative to gaol? Perhaps they could receive intensive treatment for, say, 12 weeks, followed up by work in the community. That is a way forward, and the Government should be looking at such proposals which could also help to reduce reoffending and ease prison overcrowding.

In addition, the Government must end the practice of sending young girls on remand. I am aware that Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons has been to Cornton Vale and reported on 31 May. That report has not yet been made public, but I hope that the inspectorate will recommend a course of action such as that, because it is totally inappropriate for young girls to be in such an alien and oppressive situation where they may suffer bullying and then try to take their own lives.

Angela Bollan's case illustrates that situation. Although the previous day she was, in her parents' word, "upbeat", she committed suicide a short time later. We cannot prevent every suicide in prison, but we must have a proper regime. The deficiencies need to be tackled.

I wish the Minister to elaborate on the Gunn and the Power recommendations.

Cultural change is important. Any profession may become preoccupied with a feeling of being beleaguered, misused and misunderstood. I do not want that to happen to the prison service, because it will do the interests of the prison service and prisoners no good, but a fundamental precondition is for the Scottish Prison Service constantly to recall the injunction in its mission statement to treat prisoners with humanity. The Government should give high priority to achieving some of the improvements in the name of humanity and justice.

With regard to the families—it is important to remember that I initiated this debate as a response to family pressure—crime prevention should concern itself with improving moral and material support to the family unit, as a place where most people receive love, psychological security and care, and civilised values are transmitted from one generation to another.

We know that the average prison population for females increased by 25 per cent. between 1992 and 1995. About half those women have dependent children. Most are non-violent offenders, and many have committed minor offences. Can it possibly be the best way to proceed to keep them in prison? I ask the Minister to consider that question very seriously.

Research in the United States of America shows that a prisoner without family support is six times more likely to reoffend in the year after release than one who has maintained close family links. We therefore pay a heavy price if we discard mechanisms that tend to keep family relationships intact.

We all bear responsibility for sending people to prison and for what goes on there. Therefore, the climate should be one in which we rise above the attitudes and vocabulary of revenge, war or punishment for its own sake, and speak instead the language of justice. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) eloquently did so today in the Scottish Grand Committee, and that principle should be adopted by the Government with regard to the Scottish Prison Service.

We should create a climate in which we pay more attention to moral and social relationships. Sadly, for Jim and Ann Bollan, that is lost now, but we must look to the future and make our prisons a more secure and humane environment.

I appeal to the Minister by quoting one of his heroes, Winston Churchill, who said in 1910 of the principles that should underlie penal policy:

"a constant heart-searching by all charged with the duty of punishment, a desire and eagerness to rehabilitate in the world of industry all those who have paid their dues in the hard coinage of punishment . . . and an unfaltering faith that there is a treasure, if you can only find it, in the heart of every man"— and in the heart of every woman.

12.7 am

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) for the opportunity to place on record the policy of the Scottish Prison Service regarding suicide prevention.

No one can be anything but extremely concerned about suicides in prison. The loss of lives, especially young lives, in any circumstances is a matter of the greatest regret to us all, and I wish to take this opportunity to offer my condolences to the families of those who have taken their lives while in custody at Cornton Vale, at Greenock, and at those other prisons where there have been such deaths in recent months.

The hon. Gentleman referred to his constituent, Angela Bollan, who died in custody in Cornton Vale on 26 April 1996. I offer my deepest sympathy to Miss Bollan's family. A fatal accident inquiry will be held into the circumstances surrounding her death, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that any recommendations made by the sheriff will be considered very seriously by the Scottish Prison Service and by Ministers.

There will always be a fatal accident inquiry after any death in custody, unless there is a murder case. I am aware that, only today, a fatal accident inquiry has begun into the death of another young woman at Cornton Vale prison.

There are no easy answers to suicides in prisons—however, that is not to say that there is little that can be done about suicides. The staff of the Scottish Prison Service do a difficult job on behalf of society and they deserve the support of all law-abiding citizens. They take seriously their duty of care to those committed to custody, they identify those at risk of self-harm, and they do whatever they can to minimise that risk. There is much that can be done, and there is much that is being done.

There is no quick-fix solution to suicide, whether in prison or in the community. As the hon. Member will be aware, suicides in the community have also been rising. An increase in prison suicides is all the more likely when significant numbers of those committed to prison have a history of drug misuse, the withdrawal from which brings with it a range of problems with which prison medical staff and ordinary prison officers have to deal.

The Scottish Prison Service's suicide prevention strategy has three main strands: screening to encourage the identification of prisoners at risk, the provision of appropriate care, and good communications by all those involved. It recognises the problems prisoners bring with them into prison or develop while in prison, and it aims to engage medical staff, prison nurses and all other people working in prisons to identify prisoners at risk and to provide appropriate care.

Guidance is available to all prisons on how to deal with prisoners at risk, which takes account of good practice in other institutional settings and which also recognises the reality of the prison situation. However, it is important to remember that prisons are places of secure custody for those who have broken the law and who are deemed by the courts to be in need of such custody for the protection of the public, either because of the nature of their offences or because of the frequency of their offending. Being in prison is certainly no joy ride.

The public have a right to protection from those who, through their anti-social behaviour, consistently infringe the liberty of law-abiding people. There are very few offenders who find themselves in prison as a result of only one brush with the law or one court appearance. For the majority—this applies to women as well as to men—a whole variety of alternatives to custody will have been experienced before a custodial sentence is imposed.

The hon. Gentleman hinted—if I understood him correctly—that there is a place for bail hostels. The Government recognise that supervised and supported accommodation can make a contribution. I appreciate that, for some young people, being remanded in a prison or young offenders institution will be a troubling and difficult experience. However, the court has to achieve a proper balance between the risk that the alleged offender may pose to the community and the risk to the young person. Sometimes, remand in custody is the only option.

Breaches of bail are a serious problem. The public find it difficult to understand why an habitual offender can appear in court one day, only to be released on bail to commit further offences, to cause further distress to victims and to use up police resources. I accept that supervision in the community also has an important role to play in tackling reoffending while on bail.

Three years ago, we widened the scope of those services receiving 100 per cent. central Government funding to incorporate two pilot bail supervision projects in Lothian and Strathclyde. The projects will be evaluated to assess the impact of bail supervision on the behaviour of those who are subject to it.

It is our policy to promote the development, within 100 per cent. funding of criminal justice social work services, of a sufficient network of supervised criminal justice accommodation to enable courts or the Parole Board to impose conditions of residence where they think it necessary in the public interest. Offenders could be on bail, on probation or on supervision after release from custody. Development of the network will be phased over a number of years. An offer in principle has been made to the relevant local authority—Dundee council—for the establishment of a new bail hostel in Tayside.

Whatever the alternatives to prison, however, there will continue to be a need for certain people to be remanded in or committed to prison in the interest of protecting the public, and we need to be realistic about what prisons are. As a sheriff recently observed, prisons are not hospitals; nor are they schools. Identification of those who are at risk is not easy for the professional psychiatrist, far less the ordinary gallery officer. Without that identification, the provision of appropriate care—even within the limitations of the prison environment—is doubly difficult.

Having said that, I do not wish to underestimate the commitment of the Scottish Prison Service to developing and managing a strategy for the care of prisoners at risk that is effective and humane. I am, of course, aware of the criticisms that have been made of the workings of that strategy, but I wish to put on record that the findings of fatal accident inquiries into the deaths of two young women at Cornton Vale, and other recent deaths, have attributed no blame to the staff or management of the Scottish Prison Service.

Like any policy for dealing with human behaviour, the suicide prevention strategy of the Scottish Prison Service will adapt to changing circumstances. The recommendations of Professor Gunn and Dr. Kevin Power are being carefully considered, and a number of their recommendations can readily be taken on board. Others will require more careful thought.

A recurring theme from those who have studied the difficult issue of suicides in prison—from Dr. Chiswick, who investigated suicides at Glenochil in the 1980s, to Professor Gunn and Dr. Power—is the criticism, including criticism by some staff of the Scottish Prison Service, of the use of isolation and seclusion as a response to the apparently suicidal. By "isolation and seclusion", I mean the practice—which is found in virtually all prison systems—of isolating the apparently suicidal in a cell in which the means of self-harm are not available.

I readily accept that that practice, if applied day and night, is unlikely to address the underlying mental and psychological disturbances that may precipitate the suicidal tendency in the prisoner; but it is nevertheless a fact that those who are so isolated do not in general succeed in taking their own lives. In general, it is not prisoners who are under suicide supervision who do so.

Professor Gunn and others have recommended over the years that isolation and seclusion in so-called stripped cells should not be used, at least during the day. They recommend a more therapeutic approach, with, in appropriate cases, 24-hour surveillance of those who present as potentially suicidal. Professor Gunn has suggested that every Scottish Prison Service custodial establishment—that is, some 19 separate institutions—should have an observational ward for the potentially suicidal, staffed for 24 hours a day.

I do not dispute the value of 24-hour surveillance, but careful consideration must be given not only to the resource implications but to the practicality, in a prison setting where the prospect of a period in a hospital environment runs the risk of being an irresistible temptation to those who pose no suicide risk but who, by presenting as suicidal, would seek to manipulate the authorities into removing them from normal circulation for their own ends.

That is one of the dilemmas facing prison staff—the identification of the genuinely suicidal, and distinguishing them from those who would and do use the threat of suicide to achieve an advantage of some kind. I do, however, agree that proper emphasis should be placed on care for the genuinely suicidal, and I know that the Scottish Prison Service will be considering the recommendations that have been made in that regard very carefully.

The Prisons Board will be considering Professor Gunn's recommendations later this week. Both Professor Gunn and Dr. Power have emphasised the need for more staff training. I assure hon. Members that particular attention will be paid to what further steps can be taken to improve staff's understanding of the suicide prevention strategy, and to professional training.

A number of steps have been taken to improve the professionalism of staff. Forty per cent. of nurses working in the Prison Service now have registered mental qualifications, compared with fewer than 10 per cent. three years ago. In recent weeks, the service has embarked on a major campaign to increase the volume and quality of psychological services through a major recruitment campaign, and a rolling programme of training with at-risk prisoners is under way for prison nursing staff.

At Cornton Vale, specific measures have been taken. Staffing levels within the remand unit have been raised to improve supervision and interaction. Prisoners within the unit are out of cell to the maximum extent possible during the daytime, and work is in hand to improve the activities available to them. It should be remembered, of course, that remand prisoners are not required, under the present rules, to work. The provision of purposeful activity for such prisoners is a major challenge for prison management.

I do not believe that the recent cluster of suicides at Cornton Vale is attributable to shortcomings on the part of prison staff or to fundamental failures in the Scottish Prison Service's suicide prevention strategy. Neither Professor Gunn nor Dr. Power concluded that the strategy is not working. I must make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that any recommendations made by fatal accident inquiries will be taken extremely seriously, as will any of their observations.

I stress that everyone has a part to play in the prevention of suicide, including prisoners. The listener scheme at Edinburgh prison, in which designated volunteer prisoners provide confidential support to those who come to them for help, has been widely praised, and has been commended by Professor Gunn. It is being extended to other prisons, with the assistance of the Samaritans. Families and friends also have a role, and I urge any who have reason to be concerned about the possibility of self-harm by a prisoner to contact the governor of the prison concerned.

The staff of the Scottish Prison Service have the most important part to play—by staff, I mean all staff. Suicide prevention is not the preserve of doctors, nurses or other professionals. All staff must be alert to risk, and discipline staff in the galleries are perhaps better placed than most to pick up the signals.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for highlighting this distressing matter. Where further training is required, it will be provided. Where communications need to be improved, they will be. There is no lack of commitment to the task by the management and staff of the Prison Service, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will join me in wishing them well in the difficult job they do.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point: that less serious offences do not necessarily merit imprisonment. I agree. He has said before that fine defaulters should not necessarily be imprisoned, and that there should be better ways of dealing with them. We should explore those matters, but the public need to be protected from dangerous criminals—we are not in dispute over that. These matters need to be studied carefully in the light of the findings and recommendations of the fatal accident inquiries.

As the hon. Gentleman knows—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

Travel Vaccines

1. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that travel vaccines continue to be made available on the NHS. [31694]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): Yes.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Minister aware that last year alone 39 million British people made overseas visits, 16 per cent. of them to areas with a high risk of infection? Will he resist any suggestions that vaccination should cease to be available on the NHS? If he does not, many people may not get vaccinated, which would lead to an increase in the number of infected travellers returning to Britain, thereby increasing costs to the national health service and having a detrimental effect on many people's health.

Mr. Bowis: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair case for the economic health of the nation that enables so many people to travel abroad, and a good point about travellers needing to take precautions. Just as they need to take out travel insurance, they should consider their health protection. I hope that they will read the "Health Information for Overseas Travel" booklet produced by the Government. The position of successive Governments has been that immunisations are free for travellers where there is considered to be a real risk to public health if a disease is brought back to the United Kingdom. That remains the case. I am happy to join him in resisting any change to that.

Mr. Fabricant: Before my hon. Friend is overcome by generosity, will he bear in mind that many business travellers have their vaccinations paid for by their companies? It is difficult to have sympathy with people who go on exotic holidays to Australia and Thailand who say that they cannot afford to pay for their vaccinations.

Mr. Bowis: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. That is why there is a balance in the system whereby vaccinations for diseases that would not be a threat to the remainder of the population if someone were to bring them back from abroad are the responsibility of the individual. As he said, they may be paid for by a company, but the cost is small compared with the overall cost of travel abroad, certainly to the remote places that he mentioned. Where there is a potential public health risk, it is right that the NHS system should be able to provide the service through doctors or clinics.

Purchasing Contracts

2. Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the chairmen of NHS trusts to discuss the administrative costs of purchasing contracts. [31695]

7. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about administrative costs in the NHS. [31700]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I meet NHS trust chairmen regularly. The Government are committed both to the effective management of the NHS and to the reduction of unnecessary bureaucracy.

Mr. Touhig: While I recognise that an extra £1.4 billion was put into the national health service in 1993-94, every penny of it went on administrative costs. Is that obsession with bureaucracy, as opposed to front-line services, the reason why three quarters of NHS trusts have yet to make a local pay offer to nurses four months after Ministers pledged action on the matter? Is that another broken Tory promise?

Mr. Dorrell: The Opposition's concern about bureaucracy would be a great deal more convincing if they had not voted against the abolition of the regional health authorities, which was the biggest single element in the £300 million programme for shifting resources out of unnecessary bureaucracy into front-line patient services.

The Government have made it clear that nurses' pay arrangements are a matter for local agreement between employers and local nurses groups, against the guarantee of a minimum increase of 2 per cent. on a national basis.

Mr. Bennett: Will the Secretary of State now confirm that there are 20,000 extra NHS managers and 50,000 fewer nurses as a result of the Government's programme? Is that by design on the part of the Government or by accident?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman persists in deliberately misreading figures, despite repeated explanations of what the figures he quotes mean. He might do well to remember the words of the previous shadow health spokesman, who said:

"I don't think it's really in question any more that the NHS has been under-managed in the past."

That is why the Government strengthened NHS management and why the NHS is now delivering more patient care to higher quality more efficiently than it has ever done before.

Sir Sydney Chapman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that administrative costs in the health service should be kept in proportion? Does he further agree that, if increased administrative costs result in more medically qualified people undertaking less administrative work, and in the more effective targeting of the ever-increasing funding of our national health service for the benefit of patients, they are justified.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is on a very important point. He underlines the interest that every taxpayer and every patient of the NHS has in its efficient management. The question that should be asked of the Opposition Front-Bench team, particularly of the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) in the light of press reports at the weekend, is why the Labour party wishes to disfranchise 6.5 million people who take out private health insurance and prevent them ever playing any part in the management of NHS trusts and health authorities.

Mr. Thomason: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the proportion of NHS staff who are involved in the direct care of patients has increased in the past decade?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is on to an important point. We have increased commitment to front-line services, delivering more treatment to more patients than ever before in the history of the NHS. The Labour party is more concerned with dogma. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Darlington says that I should not believe everything that I read in the newspapers. Perhaps he would like to deny the story in the weekend newspapers, since it appeared in quotation marks, attributed to him.

Ms Harman: Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the bill for bureaucracy for his NHS internal market is an extra £1.5 billion every year? Is he aware that, because of the market, St. Thomas's and Guy's hospitals now have to send out 57,000 invoices every year? How can he justify children being turned away from intensive care and their parents being told, "Sorry, there is no bed"? How can he justify patients waiting for hours on trollies? How can he justify patients being told at the last minute, "Sorry, we are cancelling your operation"? How can he justify any of that while he squanders precious NHS resources on red tape to run the market?

Mr. Dorrell: Rather than uttering these repetitive soundbites, the hon. Lady might do better to explain to the NHS and to the public what she means when she says that she will abolish the internal market. Her policy document is clear. She retains the purchaser system. She retains the principle that purchasers should be free to place their contracts where their patients' advantage lies. How will she do that while delivering the commitment that she professes to abolish an internal market?

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the benefits of the internal market is that it has enabled health authorities to focus on the real issues of health need and effectiveness of health care? Does he agree that it is nonsense for people to pretend that the NHS can be managed without managers, and managed on a system based on ignorance? Have not the changes led to real improvements in the quality of health care given to the people of this country?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right. The interest of every patient and every taxpayer is that the health service should be efficiently managed and that health resources should be targeted at real health need. That is the purpose of NHS management. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) professes to mean that, but consistently commits herself to undermining the structure that makes it possible.

Community Care

3. Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met representatives of local authorities to discuss the provision of care to the elderly people living in the community. [31696]

Mr. Bowis: I meet them on a wide range of formal and informal occasions and discuss with them an equally wide range of issues.

Mr. Purchase: Is the Minister aware of the considerable confusion that exists in local authorities and in other agencies, such as Age Concern and widows' associations, and the tremendous anxiety that many older people now feel about their future and about the Government's plans, which seem to be aimed at further commercialising and privatising the health services that older people have a right to rely on, having paid for them all their working lives?

Mr. Bowis: In that case, I am sure that, if the hon. Gentleman has discerned this concern, he will reassure those people by pointing out that 40 per cent. of NHS health care spending is spent on people over 65, despite the fact that they are only 16 per cent. of the population. I am sure that he will also have reassured them by pointing out that the present Government have enabled social services departments to spend £5.7 billion on their community care needs.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have noticed—although he does not appear to wish to notice it at this moment—the considerable increase in contact hours for people receiving care in their own home, up 42 per cent. in the past three years. Those are measures of success and care, and show that the Government do care about the future of the increasing numbers of elderly people in this nation—people who can rely on our policies, although, when it comes to the Opposition's policies, they will have to wait for a royal commission.

Dame Jill Knight: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important things that helps elderly people living in their own homes is the home help service? Is he aware that many local authority social services departments now state that doing the shopping should be top priority for home helps, but that the people they help need a reasonably clean home, whereas neighbours and relatives will often do the shopping? Can he do something about that?

Mr. Bowis: My hon. Friend is right to suggest that local authorities, which are responsible for arranging social care when that is needed, should listen carefully to the users of those services and their families to discover what type of services they should be purchasing on their behalf. I believe that the Community Care (Direct Payments) Bill, which is passing through the House, will also help people in the coming years as more and more people are able to benefit from that. It does, however, as the Audit Commission pointed out, depend also on the efficient use of the substantial resources that the taxpayer is providing for local government and social services in particular. It is no good, as Liverpool is doing, spending £500 a week on each person in its own care homes compared with the £198 a week that it spends on independent homes, and then wondering why there is not enough for other services.

General Practitioner Fundholding

4. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent monitoring he has undertaken of GP fundholding. [31697]

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): Throughout the country, general practitioner fundholders are improving services to patients through effective management of resources. Health authorities monitor them monthly, in accordance with the accountability framework; and the national health service executive monitors both health authorities and fundholders through its regional offices.

Mr. Chisholm: What assessment has the Minister made of the recent Audit Commission report on GP fundholding? Can he confirm that the report vindicates the long-standing criticisms that Labour has made of the scheme, and does he agree that fundholding involves massive duplication of bureaucracy without any significant benefits to patients?

Mr. Malone: No, of course not. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I have read the report from beginning to end. It shows that every fundholder has brought benefits to patients. It also says that some, who have not brought as many benefits to patients as others, should be encouraged. I would expect the hon. Gentleman to support that idea.

This is an investment in patient care which has brought about a better quality of patient care for more than 50 per cent. of the population in England. In the interests of his own constituents, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will ensure that that is emulated in Edinburgh.

Sir James Hill: Does my hon. Friend agree that the difference between a single GP and a group of fundholding GPs is the collective amount of money available? I already know of several individual GPs in Southampton who have run out of funds long before their group counterparts. Would it be possible to send teams to the new unitary authorities—now in the middle of the reorganisation—to advise GPs and social workers of the benefits of GP fundholding?

Mr. Malone: It is never very gracious to disagree with a knight of the realm—I congratulate my hon. Friend on that distinction—and in any event I do not disagree with the substance of his question. We certainly expect health authorities to work with fundholders and non-fundholders to build better care for patients. I am sure that that is happening in my hon. Friend's local health authority.

Mr. Milburn: Does the Minister agree with the Audit Commission's conclusion that GP fundholding has added to management costs in all parts of the NHS? How does he justify wasting £260 million a year on red tape for fundholding when it produces no gains for patients? Will he now accept that the replacement of fundholding by GP commissioning will not only give all family doctors a say in shaping hospital services for their patients but will shift NHS resources from back-line bureaucracy to front-line patient care?

Mr. Malone: The hon. Gentleman makes exactly the same mistake as his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm)—not reading the report or understanding its conclusions. The report clearly points out that, for an on-going payment of some two per cent. of total budget, there is a four per cent. gain in patient care efficiency. The hon. Gentleman persistently refuses to understand that that is a benefit for patients. I am glad that he and his hon. Friends have now clearly told the world that that is an advantage that they would abolish—that is their firm policy. The 50 per cent. or so who are GP fundholders will understand that it is the Labour party's intention to abolish them if it ever comes to power, as will the 53 per cent. of the population who benefit from GP fundholding.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Contrary to the drivel talked by the Opposition spokesman, is my hon. Friend aware that giving decision-making powers to GPs in my constituency has produced a better standard of primary health care than ever before? Is it not disgraceful that the Labour party should now decide to take away those powers from GPs and give them to the party's own bureaucrats, quangos and councillors? Such a move would be bad for primary care in my constituency.

Mr. Malone: My hon. Friend is right. The point that he rightly makes is that it is the effective purchasing power of general practitioners which has brought about change. Conservatives welcome the fact that other GPs are becoming involved in the purchasing process, but it has been driven by GP fundholding—the true success story which has brought far better patient care to all constituents, including those of my hon. Friend.

Private Finance

5. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the progress of schemes costing over £10 million using private finance. [31698]

Mr. Dorrell: The full potential of the private finance initiative is now being realised. Since the initiative started, seven schemes valued at more than £10 million each have been approved, with a total capital value of £394 million. Another 50 schemes worth between £1 million and £10 million have been approved, with a total capital value of £130 million, and 40 schemes with an estimated capital value of £1.5 billion are currently being tested for private finance.

Mr. Martlew: The Minister will be aware that we have been waiting for a new hospital in Carlisle for more than 20 years. Is he aware that, for the past two years, the private finance initiative has delayed that hospital? There are currently 556 beds in Carlisle, but the PFI scheme will reduce that number to 274. I understand that AMEC, the only bidder for the scheme, is talking about reducing the number of beds to 400. Will the Minister give us an assurance that 474 beds will be the minimum? Can he confirm that the price of the scheme is still £43 million?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman understates the extent to which the PFI is bringing forward the hospital. It is not 20 years since the idea was first tabled—it is almost 30 years. The Cumberland infirmary project was first tabled in 1968. It is a source of considerable pride to me that the PFI is making it possible to turn that idea, of almost 30 years standing, into a firm project for the benefit of the hon. Gentleman's constituents. I hoped that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that. As he knows, the project design is the subject of continuing local discussions.

Mrs. Roe: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the trade union Unison vigorously opposes any use of the private finance initiative in the national health service? Does he believe that there is a link between Unison's continuing financial support for the Labour Front Bench and their attempt to claim that on the PFI they will be able to face both ways?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend raises an important point. There is no doubt where Unison stands on this issue—the doubt rests with where the Labour Front Bench stands. The Leader of the Opposition says that the PFI is right in principle and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) says that the PFI is a new trick to privatise the health service—both propositions cannot be the Labour party's policy.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister confirm the number of hospitals that have been approved and have signed contracts? The people of Norwich and Swindon have consistently had their new hospitals approved, but no contracts have been signed. Earlier this year, the Minister rushed legislation through the House to try to bail out the Government's PFI initiative. Yesterday, in the Financial Times, Martin Laing of the Laing Construction Group attacked the Bill. He said that he wanted more assurances and guarantees from the Government before PFI could go ahead.

The latest row that besets the Tory ranks is Edgware hospital. The services that will be lost at Edgware hospital should be transferred to Barnett, which has been delayed for the past two years because of the PFI. When will we get some common sense in the debate? When will the Government get proper private and public partnerships that look after the interests of the British people, instead of the dogma that is floating around in the debate?

Mr. Dorrell: In order to appeal to the hon. Gentleman, I will offer a sotto voce reply. The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends simply have to answer the following question: are they in favour of the PFI? Introducing all kinds of questions and red herrings will not get them off the hook. Are they in favour of the Leader of the Opposition's policy or are they in favour of the shadow health spokesman's policy? It is a simple question and the Labour Front Bench has to sort it out.

South Humber Health Authority

6. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current number of patients on the waiting list for the South Humber health authority. [31699]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): Provisional figures show that at 30 April 1996 there were 6,919 South Humber residents waiting for admission to hospital, all but seven of whom had been waiting for less than 12 months. This is a significant improvement on recent figures.

Mr. Brown: Will my hon. Friend confirm that, in the 1970s, approximately 20 per cent. of the patients were on the waiting list for more than 12 months? Does not his answer indicate that we have made dramatic improvements in South Humber? I refer to one point of concern to local residents: yesterday there was a report that too many operations are being cancelled at the last minute. Will the Minister assure me and my constituents that he will look into this matter, as there is nothing more distressing for a patient than being called to hospital only to have an operation cancelled?

Mr. Horam: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's latter comment: there is nothing more distressing than having an operation cancelled at the last minute. There has been a problem in my hon. Friend's area due to the illness of one consultant combined with a sudden increase in the number of emergency admissions. However, all but one of the people whose operations were cancelled were admitted within a month—which is within patients charter standards. Given the excellent performance of South Humberside in reducing its waiting list—my hon. Friend paid tribute to that record—I know that it will make every effort to ensure that it does not happen again.

Basildon Hospital

8. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's recent inspection of facilities at Basildon hospital. [31701]

Mr. Malone: There has been no recent departmental inspection but, as my hon. Friend knows, I recently visited Basildon hospital where I was able to see the new Mary Wright unit for general practitioner referrals. I was impressed by the way that the unit speeds up the entry of patients to hospital and reduces the pressure on the accident and emergency department.

Mr. Amess: Does my hon. Friend agree that the local hospital has been able to develop and enhance services since obtaining trust status? Will he join me in celebrating Hospice Fortnight and in congratulating the staff of St. Luke's hospice in my constituency, of Fair Haven in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) and of Little Haven in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) on their magnificent work?

Mr. Malone: I am happy to join my hon. Friend in his remarks. The trust in his area has an extremely impressive record. Day case activity has increased by 25.9 per cent. and the trust achieved a maximum wait of 12 months for all day cases and in-patient treatments by the end of March 1996. No patient waits for more than 13 weeks for a routine first out-patient appointment. I also remember visiting the trust when it was awarded a citizens charter mark for excellence in service provision—which is much appreciated by all patients.

Mr. Mackinlay: Does the Minister visit hospitals prior to their being awarded charter marks or hospitals that are not awarded charter marks? If he did, he might have visited Basildon during the bad times that were endured by my constituents in Thurrock and by the people of Basildon who suffered inordinate waiting times in the accident and emergency department because of the closure of the accident and emergency department at Orsett hospital. The people of Edgware are soon to suffer a similar experience. The fact is that the Minister turns up when there is good news but he is not prepared to face patients during the bad times like those suffered by the people of Thurrock and of Basildon.

Mr. Malone: I visited the Basildon trust within a few weeks of being appointed Minister in order to see how our policies were affecting it. The hon. Gentleman is quite right: there were bad times. However, the bad times have gone and the good times are here as a result of our policies which the hon. Gentleman has persistently opposed.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

9. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the reported incidence of CJD worldwide since 1986. [31702]

Mr. Dorrell: Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease occurs worldwide at an average incidence of up to one case per million people.

Mrs. Gorman: Given the disgraceful way in which the Opposition—particularly the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman)—sought to exploit the alleged connection between bovine spongiform encephalopathy and CJD, will my right hon. Friend confirm the latest results which show that the new strain of CJD is occurring in countries that are BSE-free, including many European countries? Does he agree with Dr. Paul Brown, the director of the United States Health Authority and a world expert on the subject, who has said that the incidence of three or four cases of the new strain of CJD in Europe will blow out of the water the thesis that the new strain is caused by BSE? The hon. Member for Peckham will then have to apologise.

Mr. Dorrell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the disreputable behaviour of the hon. Member for Peckham in seeking to feed public fears during the early stages of the argument. As to the incidence of the new strain of CJD, so far there has been one confirmed case outside the United Kingdom in France, although, as my hon. Friend rightly says, it is important that we continue to cast the net widely. That approach was supported by the World Health Organisation in May. The work is being co-ordinated from the British Government CJD surveillance centre in Edinburgh, which is recognised as a world centre of expertise in the matter.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Secretary of State recall that, when he made his statement on this issue in March, I pressed him about resources for research into CJD? Does he therefore understand my surprise at discovering, when I visited the Western general hospital in Edinburgh a week last Friday, that, although verbal promises have been made about additional resources, it has received nothing in writing and, basically, it has the same team as was working in March; that those doctors still have to carry out their responsibilities without the certainty of additional hands to share the work; and that, in the past fortnight, only advertisements have appeared—produced jointly by the Department for Health and the Medical Research Council—for research to be undertaken by those who are dedicated to the work? Is it not time that we gave priority to that work and made resources available? It is a scandal that, three months on, that is not being done.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that the people doing the work are leading practitioners in the relevant medical fields. I make no apology for that, since they are best placed to make the necessary judgments to ensure that we understand the issue properly. On resources and the development of the research programme, I announced to the House in March that the Government support such development, and the hon. Gentleman has just reported the fact that that development is going ahead.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the European country that has the highest incidence of CJD is Austria, and that international studies indicate that there is no correlation between the incidence of CJD and behavioural patterns, such as whether one eats beef or meat or is merely a stupid vegan?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend expresses his own views about vegans or—possibly—a particular sub-group of vegans. He underlines the fact that any link between beef eating and CJD has not been proven. Indeed, it is some way from being proven.

Prescriptions

10. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of prescriptions issued in the last 12 months were for more than one item. [31703]

Mr. Bowis: It is estimated that 40 per cent. of prescription forms dispensed in the past 12 months were for more than one item.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister recognise that many people on low incomes who have to pay full prescription charges for two items every month have considerable difficulty meeting that cost? They cannot afford to pay for pre-payment certificates and there is a problem. Does he also recognise that there is a particular problem with dual packs, for which people have to pay two prescription charges?

Mr. Bowis: The hon. Gentleman referred to people on low incomes. If they are on income support, they do not have to pay for prescriptions. I remind him that, when the Labour Government reintroduced prescription charges, exemptions ran at 42 per cent. The rate is now 85 per cent. A further 5 per cent. of people benefit from pre-payment certificates, to which he referred.

He can set those people's minds at rest. It is true that there are two charges for a combination pack. That is because two drugs are packed together. If it were otherwise, it would be quite unfair on people who pay for multiple prescriptions. Curiously, any change would also be a perverse incentive to manufacturers to package their drugs in combination packs.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for spelling out the exemptions. Will he explain the different categories of people who get free prescriptions?

Mr. Bowis: Yes, I will. Those who are exempted from prescription charges are men and women aged 60 and over, children under 16, students under 19, a person or partner receiving income support, family credit or disability working allowance, people entitled to full help under the NHS low income scheme, pregnant women and women who have had a child in the previous 12 months, and people who receive a war or Ministry of Defence disablement pension who need medication for that disablement. In addition, some medical conditions carry exemption. A tremendous number of people are exempt. We have one of the most generous exemption systems in Europe, which is why we can say that the vast majority of people who cannot afford to pay are well covered by it.

Mrs. Mahon: Is it not the case that many students, even those below income support level, do not receive free prescriptions? Would the Minister like to comment on that?

Mr. Bowis: If the hon. Lady is saying that people below income support level are not receiving free prescriptions, they are entitled to do so. The hon. Lady has only to add up the numbers about which we are talking—[Interruption.] I am sure that she can add up. If the total adds up to the 85 per cent. of British people who are entitled to free prescriptions, and a further 5 per cent. who benefit from the pre-payment certificates, she will see that there is not a problem. She will also see that it is a much more generous system than it was when the Labour Government reintroduced prescription charges.

Mrs. Mahon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I take points of order after Questions.

Mrs. Mahon: In view of the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I give notice that I intend to raise the matter on the Adjournment—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady did not ask the substantive question, so I am afraid that she does not have the opportunity to do that.

Private Finance Initiative

11. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many private finance initiative projects have been approved in respect of national health service trust hospitals; and how many are awaiting approval. [31704]

Mr. Horam: Since the launch of the private finance initiative, 41 national health service trust schemes valued at £1 million or above have been approved, with a total capital value of £472 million. Forty more projects, with a total value of approximately £1.5 billion, are testing for private finance as part of the procurement process.

Mr. Rowe: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply. Will he undertake to do two things? First, as the experience of his excellent scheme grows, will he make every effort to ensure that the rules governing it become much simpler for trusts and others to understand? Secondly, will he review again the balance between the advantage that the trusts obtain from skilful use of their capital assets and the amount that the central authorities take from those capital assets for their own purposes?

Mr. Horam: I understand my hon. Friend's points. It is not only a question of making the rules simpler, but of making the contract shorter as well. I am sure that my hon. Friend, with his interest in small companies, will agree that we must make it a process that is as available to them as it is to the large conglomerates. I certainly give him that assurance.

Mr. Burden: If the Minister thinks that the PFI is as successful as he says, would he care to comment on the position of the Rubery Hollymoor primary health care centre in my constituency? It was promised to local people four years ago, they were told that the money was available from the NHS two years ago, it was trumpeted as a great new project by the then regional health authority, but it has been held up by the PFI and not one stone has yet been laid. Does the hon. Gentleman think it right that the working of the PFI should deny local people the services that the Government promised them?

Mr. Horam: I do not know the particular scheme to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I shall look into it. None the less, the PFI is accelerating the process. We are breaking out of the traditional system whereby everyone has to wait for the Treasury—waiting for Godot, one might say. If the scheme is good and provides value for money, and the risk is properly apportioned, it can obtain private sector finance. We are talking about a new era for hospital building in Britain, yet we still do not know what the Opposition think about it.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is my hon. Friend encouraged by the splendid progress being made by the £100 million PFI project for a new hospital at Darenth Park to serve the people of Gravesham and Dartford? Will he do the best he can to sweep out of the way any obstacles that might arise, particularly those that might arise from the scaremongering of the Labour party and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman)?

Mr. Horam: Yes, I confirm to my hon. Friend that that is an important scheme, which I am anxious should go ahead and to which I am giving constant attention.

Dentists

12. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to increase the number of dentists offering treatment in the national health service. [31705]

Mr. Malone: There are nearly 16,000 dentists on health authority lists in England—an increase of 500 since 1992 alone. The reforms that I announced in the House last week should provide a further boost to NHS dentistry by removing uncertainty for the dental profession and creating a firm foundation for future development.

Mr. Prentice: That answer will be cold comfort for my constituents in Barnoldswick. The Minister will recall that, last Wednesday, I told him that there was one NHS dentist in Barnoldswick—a town of 10,000 people. Today, there is not one NHS dentist in that town. Are not the Government's proposals to revitalise NHS dentistry a complete sham? Is it not the case that they are, as I described them last Wednesday, fraudulent?

Mr. Malone: The hon. Gentleman's point is as absurd today as it was last week because, by implication, he is saying that dentists, who are self-employed practitioners, had been nationalised under a Labour Government and directed to work in certain places where he wished them to work. I have examined the situation in his constituency, and in Barnoldswick. Dental treatment is available in Colne, some five miles away, or in Burnley or Nelson.

He and his right hon. and hon. Friends say that the service has been destroyed. I must say that they have some argument. We have allegedly killed off NHS dentistry since 1979—by spending 57 per cent. more on it in real terms than was being spent then. We have also increased the number of dentists who provide general dental service by 3,500. If the hon. Gentleman could get such a pledge from his Front Bench about funding the service, he might have a point to make.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Berry: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 18 June. [31724]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Berry: Is the Prime Minister aware that he spoke for the whole nation on Friday when he said that he had had "a bellyful" of the Tory party?

The Prime Minister: I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that his quotation is inaccurate, but it could certainly be applied to questions such as that.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that more and more people in Germany wish that their economy was run like ours—with low inflation, steady economic growth, flexible labour markets and falling unemployment? Will he take an early opportunity to invite the leaders of the German opposition parties to Britain so that they can see what can be achieved with Conservative policies?

Mr. Faulds: More, more.

The Prime Minister: I am glad to see that it evokes such approval on the Opposition Benches.

It is certainly true that we have at the moment the most competitive economy in western Europe, that we are in a very good position on inflation, and that unemployment is a good deal lower—and we are at the top of the growth league. That, as my hon. Friend says, is an enviable position, and I know that it is envied by many of my European partners.

Mr. Blair: Will the Prime Minister join me in condemning the appalling outrage of Saturday in Manchester and send our thanks to the emergency services and our sympathy to the victims? Is this not a moment of truth for Sinn Fein? Does it not show the wisdom of demanding a ceasefire before Sinn Fein participates in any talks? Does not the responsibility now lie squarely on it if it is to play any part in the future progress of peace?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with the right hon. Gentleman. Saturday's bomb in Manchester was a callous and inhuman act. It is a miracle that many more people were not injured and that many people were not killed. What is so startling is the total indifference of the people who left that bomb to what could well have happened to many people who have no connection whatever with the disputes in Ireland or the disputes that the IRA may have with the British Government or others.

The right hon. Gentleman is right. The time has come for Sinn Fein to make up its mind. Either it will be a democratic organisation taking part in democratic politics or it will stay side by side as the reverse side of the coin to the IRA, with intermingled membership, in which case it has no part in democratic politics whatever. I believe that, when the right hon. Gentleman says that the moment of truth is here, it is for Mr. Adams and his colleagues, and everybody wishes to hear precisely what their views are—and let us have no more of the measly nonsense that we have had from them in recent years.

Mr. Blair: I join with that entirely.

Does the Prime Minister also agree that there has been progress in Northern Ireland? The British and Irish Governments are agreed on the way forward; all nationalist parties in the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland, apart from Sinn Fein, are agreed on peaceful means to achieve their ends; and the United States and others abroad may have been given a telling lesson on the realities of the IRA. Is not the only course now open to Sinn Fein to ensure that the IRA ceases its violence? If it cannot—or will not—the process should proceed with the democratic parties, and an agreement should be reached and put to a ballot of the people.

The Prime Minister: It is entirely right that the talks must continue. We have no intention of allowing the search for a political settlement for Northern Ireland to be derailed by the activities of the IRA and Sinn Fein. I hope that all the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland will continue to demonstrate the leadership and courage necessary to make rapid progress, and to show the IRA that it cannot stop the process with bombs in Manchester, London or anywhere else.

If the IRA and Sinn Fein wish to have any future interest in this process, they will clearly need to declare an unequivocal ceasefire. They will need to declare it immediately. They will also have to show that that ceasefire is credible and lasting, and is not just a tactical device to enable them to enter the talks until such time as it is convenient for them to leave. It is now up to them to demonstrate their credibility; it is not up to us or anyone else. They must demonstrate their credibility—but the talks will continue.

Mrs. Roe: In the light of falls in unemployment, interest rates and inflation, does my right hon. Friend agree that Britain is now one of the most competitive economies in Europe? Does he accept, however, that much more still needs to be done to raise standards in our schools? Although things are improving, far too many children still leave school without the basic skills.

The Prime Minister: Both the premise of my hon. Friend's question and her substantive point are important. She knows that the British economy is in very sound shape; we intend to keep it so. As for education and basic standards, the Government have introduced a programme of reforms that is more comprehensive than any that we have seen at any stage in the past, designed to raise standards in schools, build on the national curriculum and ensure regular inspection and the publication of performance information.

We have made substantial progress in recent years in raising standards, but there is no doubt that there is a great deal more that we wish to do to ensure that the quality of education for all our children is the equal of the quality of education anywhere else in the world. That is our intention, and we will continue to pursue it, despite the failures of so many Labour-controlled education authorities whose records have held back many children in inner London and elsewhere. [HON. MEMBERS: "Seventeen years."] It is no good hon. Members below the Gangway muttering in this fashion, when it is their party, in control in local government, that could act now to improve education, but does not.

Q2. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 18 June. [31725]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livingstone: Given the funds that the Government have made available to the Russian Government and organisations in Russia in recent years to help to establish democracy, has the Prime Minister had time to read today's statement by the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe expressing the CSCE's regret and concern at the extensive bias in the coverage of the presidential election? Will the right hon. Gentleman now use his contacts with President Yeltsin to point out to him the value of the British precedent of television and radio providing equal time for candidates, to legitimise this final stage of the Russian election?

The Prime Minister: I have not yet seen the particular statement to which the hon. Gentleman refers. In view of what he says, I shall certainly consider it, but the very fact of the Russian presidential elections, and the way in which they have been carried, out would have seemed inconceivable just a few years ago. It is a welcome sign that Russia is settling into the normal pattern of democracy, and we must give great credit to President Yeltsin for that. I hope that the second round will be conducted well and that there will be a clear-cut and satisfactory result.

Mr. Stewart: Does my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister agree that the control of business rates under the Government has been of immense benefit to businesses, large and small, throughout Britain and, therefore, to jobs? Will he ask the relevant Government Departments to analyse the consequences for jobs and for prosperity of taking off these controls and handing decisions back to loony Labour councils, as is advocated by the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly consider any mechanism that tries to restrain on-costs on British business. It is clear that the fact that British business as a whole pays less over and above wages in on-costs is one of the principal reasons why are more citizens are in work in Britain than in any other country of similar size throughout western Europe.

Q3. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 18 June. [31726]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Welsh: Did the Prime Minister see last night's "Panorama" programme, which catalogued 10 years of evasion and incompetence by the Government on the BSE issue? What does he have to say to Scotland's hill farmers, now awaiting being dragged into the general economic catastrophe created by the Government, while he postures to no effect in Europe?

The Prime Minister: Of course I did not waste my time watching "Panorama" last night—[Interruption.] I have much more productive things to do with my time than waste it watching nonsense from "Panorama". We have taken account of the scientific advice that we have had throughout this affair, and that is what we will continue to do in the interests of British agriculture and of the British beef consumer.

Q4. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 18 June. [31727]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: Does my right hon. Friend recall the exchanges that he and I had in the House last October, when I raised the question of closed circuit television for security purposes in our towns and cities? Is he aware that the initiative that he announced last year is one of the most practical ways of dealing with crime and of introducing crime prevention measures? Although he may not be able to confirm to me today whether my constituency of Cleethorpes is to benefit from the forthcoming announcement, will he guarantee that he will have a word with our right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and advise him that we in Cleethorpes are very supportive of that initiative?

The Prime Minister: Bringing closed circuit television to all corners of the United Kingdom is a practical effort to create a safer Britain in future. We are investing around £50 million, and our target is to fund 10,000 new cameras in the next three years. I am pleased to hear from my hon. Friend about the Cleethorpes bid. Knowing my hon. Friend, I would have been surprised if there had not been a Cleethorpes bid, but he is right—I cannot confirm to him today whether it has been successful, but I hope that announcements will be made before too long.

Mr. Litherland: The Prime Minister will understand that there are no words to describe the loathing that Manchester people have for the perpetrators of the crime against our city last Saturday, but it has happened and we must now begin to rebuild Manchester. Mancunians are resilient people, but they require help. Will the Prime Minister today give the assurance to the House that the Government will offer every support, including financial aid, for the restoration of businesses, buildings, jobs and homes in Manchester? Sympathy will not pay the bills.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has commented on three matters of importance. I entirely share his initial remarks about Manchester, and I have no doubt about the courage and determination of the people of that city in recovering from last week's incident. Individuals injured by the bomb are eligible to apply for compensation under the criminal injuries compensation scheme. The Government-backed terrorism insurance scheme will ensure that participating insurers can meet claims by companies that purchased full terrorism cover. Businesses that have not done so are likely to receive limited reimbursement and should contact their insurance companies.

The financial implications for local authorities are not yet clear. I have asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to consider carefully any application for assistance by an authority affected by the incident, and he will certainly do so. In Manchester in the past—and I am sure that this will be so in future—an effective partnership between the Government, the private sector and the city council has delivered remarkable regeneration in many parts of the city. That partnership provides an excellent basis for rebuilding, and we look forward to working with the people concerned.

Q5. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 18 June. [31728]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Sir Michael Neubert: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to pay tribute to a great man now gone, the late Sir Fitzroy Maclean? Was there not much to admire in that soldier, diplomat, Conservative Member of Parliament and patriot, who had an enviable ability for getting out of tight corners?

The Prime Minister: Sir Fitzroy Maclean was a remarkable man with many qualities to admire—from being a founder of the Special Air Services to a Minister of the Crown at this Dispatch Box. In all his many roles, Sir Fitzroy made a remarkable contribution. He also played a crucial role in work with Tito's partisans in the second world war. People will think of Sir Fitzroy Maclean as a man who lived life to the full. From what I know of him, I believe that he would regard that as a satisfactory epitaph.

Point of Order

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. In his statement yesterday on child abuse in Clwyd, the Secretary of State for Wales referred to parliamentary privilege and implied that he did not want further discussion of the matter in Parliament. This morning, Madam Speaker, I conferred with your excellent Clerks and was told that, from this evening, the matter will be sub judice. I appreciate the difficulty of establishing such an inquiry when witnesses are required to give evidence, but I have a copy of the 400-page report and its appendices, and I have read it. I disagree with the Secretary of State's view that it is defamatory. The report should be published. I find it rather odd that, on the day that the report is available in the House, we are to have no further discussion because an inquiry has been established.

Madam Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving me notice of her point of order. It is true that I have power to waive the sub judice resolution, but the House will understand that I am unable to do so in the abstract. I can do so only in respect of some specific proceeding—that is, a debate, motion or Question. If the motion that will come before the House this evening is agreed and if I receive a request to waive the sub judice resolution in relation to a specific proceeding, I shall consider the matter at the time.

Public Order (Amendment)

3.33 pm

Ms Estelle Morris (Birmingham, Yardley): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the power of arrest of section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986.

There is general agreement across the House that too many of our constituents' lives are blighted by crime and anti-social behaviour. There is, of course, great concern about serious crime, but many of my constituents express particular concern about an increase in abusive, threatening, disorderly and intimidating behaviour on the streets.

In 1986, Parliament passed section 5 of the Public Order Act, which gave police officers the power to arrest a person if he or she was engaged in offensive behaviour and continued to behave in such a manner after a warning had been issued. That Act tidied up and replaced previous laws that had given police the powers to act in similar circumstances. Indeed, it appears to be one of the few pieces of legislation that gives police the power to arrest in cases of disorderly and intimidating behaviour.

As early as 1987, Professor A. T. Smith, of Reading university, warned that Parliament might have passed a flawed law. As it is written, section 5 of the 1986 Act requires that the police officer who gives the warning must be the same police officer who made the arrest. Almost by definition, scenes of disorder involve many people and are attended by many police officers. It is quite clear that the police officer who gives a verbal warning cannot always be the same police officer who goes on to make the arrest. That clearly is not what Parliament intended.

In October 1993, police were called to a doctor's surgery in Durham, where two men were behaving in a threatening, abusive and insulting manner. They were arrested under the Public Order Act 1986, but were later acquitted of all charges because the officer who gave the warning was not the officer who subsequently made the arrest.

The case went to appeal and was rejected by Lord Justice Kennedy. However, Lord Justice Kennedy said at the time that he was "unable to discern any Parliamentary purpose in the wording as it presently stands" and that

"it would merit further Parliamentary consideration at an early date."

Last year in Birmingham, a crowd of youths were involved in a disturbance close by my constituency. They were warned about their behaviour by the duty inspector. When the behaviour persisted, a man was arrested. To the frustration of the police and the public, the Crown Prosecution Service decided not to take the case to court because the arrest had been made under the 1986 Act and was unlikely to stand up in court.

In Hampshire, people involved in scenes of public disorder after a demonstration were taken to court, but the action collapsed because of this flawed legislation. During the recent demonstrations over the Newbury bypass, police again found themselves hampered by the confusion caused by the Act. Manchester police have experienced similar difficulties because of that confusion and have now instructed their officers not to use that section of the Public Order Act 1986 at all.

It is 10 years since Parliament passed this flawed piece of legislation. It is nine years since warnings were given, and two years since a High Court judge effectively suspended the use of that section and called on Parliament to reconsider it. All that is required is for one word to be changed in section 5(4). That one change is the substance of this ten-minute Bill.

A number of Home Secretaries have failed to take the necessary action. The result is that the police do not have the power to deal with a serious and growing problem.

Defence lawyers inevitably quote Lord Justice Kennedy's High Court judgment as a reason to dismiss future action in the courts. As it stands, the law that we passed gives a licence to those who threaten public order and it fails to protect the public.

Public order offences are not some minor adjunct to criminal offences. Day in and day out, they are a cause of harassment for my constituents, the public and the police. They are the causes of intimidation, disturbance and abuse. They are the incidents of nuisance that make people's lives a misery. They feed the fear of crime that traps people in their homes, because people are too frightened to go out on the streets.

In 1980, one in five crimes resulted in a conviction in the courts or in a caution by the police. By 1994, that figure had slumped to one in 10. Unless we amend the law, the situation will deteriorate even further.

A decade ago, Parliament passed a bad law. Our constituents, the police and the community have a right to expect us to act quickly to put it right. It is our job to close dangerous loopholes that help law-breakers.

With the co-operation of the Home Office and the House, this ten-minute Bill could become law before the recess. We have a long, hot summer ahead of us—a time when, sadly, disorderly and anti-social behaviour often increases. We would be failing our constituents and those we charge with protecting the peace if we lost this opportunity to remedy this flawed piece of legislation. I am grateful to the sponsors of the Bill, who represent both sides of the House, and I hope that it will receive the support of many other hon. Members.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Ms Estelle Morris, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. James Pawsey, Dr. Lynne Jones, Mr. Patrick Thompson, Ms Tessa Jowell, Mrs. Ann Winterton, Mr. Richard Burden, Mr. Roy Thomason, Mr. Keith Bradley and Mr. Warren Hawksley.

PUBLIC ORDER (AMENDMENT)

Ms Estelle Morris accordingly presented a Bill to amend the power of arrest of section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 12 July and to be printed. [Bill 154.]

Opposition Day

[15TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Benefit Fraud

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.40 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the recent report from the Social Security Committee on measures needed to tackle housing benefit fraud; is appalled at the complacency of Her Majesty's Government's response; endorses the proposals made by the Committee; believes that further measures are urgently required to root out organised landlord fraud in the housing benefit system, to step up the number of home visits to claimants, and to clean up the National Insurance number system; and affirms its belief that accuracy and efficiency in the spending of social security funds is vital for those in need and for the taxpayer.

Let us first establish the principle—fraud, wherever perpetrated, in the benefit system or in the tax system, is wrong. In the benefit system, every pound that is defrauded is a pound less for those in real need or for the taxpayer. The accurate spending of the social security pound is good for claimants and for the nation as a whole, and the greater the accuracy that can be achieved, the more we shall be able to restore and maintain confidence and faith in our welfare state.

There should be no dispute on either side of the House about that basic starting point for our discussion. It is when we move on to determining the nature and extent of that fraud and how best a Government can set about tackling it that we start to enter a debate between the parties.

There has been some debate in recent weeks about how much fraud is in the system, and much of that discussion has focused on the extent of housing benefit fraud. In the survey of housing benefit fraud that the Government carried out recently, they estimate that there is £1 billion of fraud. The Select Committee on Social Security heard evidence that it might be twice as much as that. I emphasise the word "might", because the Select Committee was cautious in advancing that figure. It also said that it might be greater than £2 billion. At no stage has the Select Committee or the Opposition said that the amount of housing benefit fraud is £2 billion. We have said that it is likely that the Government's estimate is an underestimate.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid–Staffordshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I thought that we might get some people up at this point.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman was being so reasonable up to that point. Has not the National Audit Office endorsed the Government's figure? Will the hon. Gentleman be honest enough to go a step further in what he was saying, by pointing out that the Select Committee report was based not on any survey, but simply on the opinions of those who gave evidence to it?

Mr. Smith: First, the National Audit Office has not endorsed the Government's figure; it has commented on the Government's survey. Secondly, I shall come in a moment to the hon. Gentleman's point about the so-called assertion that was made to the Select Committee, because it was based on a considerable body of evidence.

The Government are proud of their survey. In their response to the Select Committee, they talked about how rigorous and scientific it was. Their amendment to our motion says that it was "systematic". It was not. The methodology that they used in their housing benefit fraud survey was fundamentally flawed. First, they visited only 5,000 claimants out of a total of 5 million. Secondly, the test that they used to determine the amount of fraud was, in effect, a memory test. If claimants could remember exactly what they had said when they first applied for housing benefit and gave precisely the same answers then as they had previously, the fraud investigator assumed that there was no fraud and that it was an honest, above-board claim.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): May I help the hon. Gentleman to stop digging himself further into a hole? Is he not aware that the investigators required the people they called on in the sample to provide documentary evidence of identity and other facts that related to their claims? The survey was based not on memory but on documentary evidence.

Mr. Smith: The fundamental test was a memory test. The Government continually fail to acknowledge that the determined fraudster, who quite possibly made his original application on the basis of false papers, and certainly of false information, will have been as confident about producing the self-same false documents and information the second time around as he was the first. An approach that takes that as its starting point is flawed.

The evidence to the Select Committee came from one borough. I accept that it is evidence from only one place and that it is not necessarily a scientific analysis of circumstances across the country. However, the Haringey survey, which was reported in great detail to the Select Committee, was comprehensive. Every housing benefit claimant was visited by the fraud investigators. Its emphasis was on the amount of landlord fraud in the housing benefit system. Every landlord with more than 30 properties receiving direct payment of housing benefit was targeted, visited and questioned in detail, and evidence was demanded.

The evidence that resulted from those visits is stark. It was given to the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who chairs the Select Committee, in the debate on 11 March. It is worth reflecting briefly on the nature of the evidence. He had asked those who carried out the Haringey survey to provide details of the first 15 landlords they visited and the extent of fraud in each case.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Just so that we know where the hon. Gentleman is coming from, does he think that the estimates of the present level of fraud are overstated or understated?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman should know, first, that the point that I am coming from is that I do not like fraud in the housing benefit system and, secondly, that I have already said that it is extremely likely that the Government's estimate of the extent of fraud is an underestimate. I believe that there is more fraud in the system than the Government assert. I am in the midst of giving the evidence to support that case.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I give way to the hon. Gentleman because this is clearly a day for extremely interesting and useful interventions from the Conservative Benches.

Mr. Pickles: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

So that the House can understand, if the hon. Gentleman feels that the Government's estimate is on the low side, can he explain why Opposition spokesmen have criticised the Government for making too high an estimate of local authority fraud levels? The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) made just that assertion from that very Bench in 1993.

Mr. Smith: I shall come to that precise point in a moment. The point that my hon. Friend made in 1993 was about the nature of the incentive, or rather disincentive, system that was put in place by the Government, which up to 1993 discouraged local authorities from identifying and rooting out fraud. I shall come back to that in a moment.

Let me return to the compelling evidence from the Haringey survey and the 15 landlords about whom my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead spoke on 11 March. In the case of the first landlord, to whom £13,000 a week was paid direct from the local authority in housing benefit, the survey found that 25 per cent. of the money was being fraudulently claimed. In the case of the second landlord, 23 per cent. was fraudulently claimed; the third, 67 per cent.; the fourth, 26 per cent.; the fifth, 16 per cent.; the sixth, 15 per cent.; the seventh, 11 per cent.; the eighth, 33 per cent.; the ninth, 59 per cent.; the 10th, 29 per cent.; and the 11th, 15 per cent. And so the list goes on.

The Haringey survey of landlords with multiple properties, all in direct payment from the local authority of substantial sums week after week, found that the average level of fraud was 20 per cent. That compared with the average level of fraud found by the Government in their survey of somewhere between 6 and 7 per cent.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No, I will not give way because I want to make progress on this point. I will give way later.

Of course I accept that multiple property-owning landlords in one London borough are not typical of landlords across the country as a whole, but the extent of fraud in those cases ought to alarm anyone. One of the things that worries me deeply is that the Government are far too complacent about landlord fraud where multiple direct payments are made.

The rather arcane argument that the Government and some of their Back Benchers appear to be having about precisely what the level of fraud is—whether it is £1 billion or £2 billion—evades the real problem and the real issue at the heart of the matter. Yes, we need to consider how we can cut down on fraud by claimants, but we also need to ensure that we cut down on fraud by landlords.

Such evidence as exists—the only comprehensive survey in the country is the Haringey survey—shows that the level of landlord fraud is very substantial indeed. The last thing that hon. Members should be is complacent about that.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Is it not the hon. Gentleman who is banging on about whether the figure is £1 billion or £2 billion? Of course everyone opposes fraud.

If the hon. Gentleman reads the evidence given to the Select Committee, he will find that, rightly, the decision was taken to survey the worst part of the borough of Haringey first, and that is where the large excess of fraud was found.

This question remains, however: why does the hon. Gentleman seek to prove the higher figure? What is his ulterior agenda? What would he try to do with that figure if he were able to prove it? Are we right to suspect that he wants to say, "Here is a figure; a Labour Government could get that money back easily, so we shall spend it on something else"? In other words, it is the Labour party pretending that it would increase expenditure without there being any pain in doing so.

Mr. Smith: First, I am not banging on about whether it is £1 billion or £2 billion overall—the Government are doing that. The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) has written to me about it. The Secretary of State has written to all the local authority associations, asking for the evidence on which the Select Committee based its assertions. We know what the evidence is, we know how the Select Committee reached its conclusions and we are saying that the Government are being far too complacent.

I am surprised that the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) asks why we believe that additional measures should be taken to combat fraud, especially landlord fraud. The reasons are simple; we believe that fraud is wrong and we want to do everything possible to eradicate it. We do not believe that the Government are doing enough, and we believe that we could do better. That is our simple agenda. If the hon. Gentleman thinks otherwise, he confirms what I have always thought of him—that he is less intelligent than he looks.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin rose—

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) rose—

Mr. Smith: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead.

Mr. Field: Are not the Tories today in danger of doing two things? First, they are in danger of appearing to the public as defending landlords who are ripping off taxpayers. Secondly, in disagreeing with us in our wish to control fraud so that we shall have a larger budget available to those who are in genuine need, they appear to be obstructing the wish of the House that money should be spent as taxpayers require, on genuine claimants, not on those who are committed to criminal fraud.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right. The Department of Social Security budget is £90 billion this year. I want to ensure that every pound of that is wisely and properly spent and goes into the pockets of those who need and deserve it, and are legitimately entitled to it. I want none of that money to go into fraudsters' pockets. I fear, however, that the Government are being complacent.

Mr. Jenkin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman at the moment because I want to make progress.

In their response to the Select Committee's report, the Government adopted an attitude that seemed to say, "Aren't we doing well as a Government? We have done all these things; we have taken all these steps; we are fighting fraud; we are talking about fraud. Nothing else needs to be done." That is the overwhelming thrust of the Government's response to the Select Committee, even though the Select Committee said, "This problem is urgent. Serious issues are involved. We have evidence that there is massive organised fraud from some"—I emphasise some—"landlords in the private sector." Yet the Government say, "Everything that we are doing is perfectly all right and we have everything under control."

Two passages in the Government's response might repay closer scrutiny. First, the Select Committee had suggested that any landlord receiving direct payments of housing benefit from the local authority should be required to list the other properties for which payments were being made, either in the same borough or in a different one. That is a simple enough procedure; it would enable cross-checks to be made automatically between different properties. What did the Government say to that?

> "There is a balance to be struck between imposing undue information burdens on landlords . . . and requiring them to provide information appropriate to the privilege of receiving money direct from public funds. The recommendation would impose an additional burden, whilst being easily evaded by less scrupulous landlords."

So the real reason why the Government refused that recommendation was that it would impose "an additional burden" on landlords.

Secondly, the Select Committee suggested that each landlord with more than 20 direct payment claims from a local authority should automatically be investigated as a matter of urgency—again, a sensible suggestion. Such landlords, after all, receive the most money, week after week, in direct payments sometimes amounting to thousands of pounds. The Government replied:

> "The Government is unable to accept that the Committee's blanket approach to larger landlords would be appropriate at this stage".

Yet these "larger landlords" receive the largest amounts and thus constitute the greatest risk to public funds. This is just sensible targeting at the top of the range where fraud can lose the greatest amount to the public purse. Still, the Government dismissed the idea as a "blanket approach" that they were unable to accept. Well, they ought to accept it and in general they ought to accept more of the Select Committee's proposals.

[Mr. Smith]

We know how landlord fraud operates. We know that landlords create fictitious tenancies; sometimes there are even fictitious properties. We know that sometimes there is collusion between landlords and their supposed tenants. We know that they spread their fraud across local authority boundaries. We know that they sometimes claim that higher rents are being paid than actually are. There is a host of ways in which fraudulent payments of housing benefit can be obtained.

We have proposed a series of detailed steps that we believe should be taken to help to stamp out landlord fraud. They include giving local authorities the right to obtain proof from landlords and managing agents of their right to control a property for which they are claiming direct payment of housing benefit, with the provision that a local authority could refuse payment if it was not satisfied with the information obtained.

We believe that landlords should be required to list other properties in their control for which direct payments are being received. We believe that local authorities and the Benefits Agency should be allowed lists of all redirected mail for claimants from the Post Office. We believe, too, that landlords of multiple-occupation dwellings should be required to have a licence. A self-financing licensing scheme would both help to deter fraud and do much to improve safety standards and maintenance in such houses. However, when my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) proposed such a scheme during the passage of the Housing Bill, the Government rejected it.

We believe that special teams of investigators should be established across all local authorities, not just in London—which the Government, rather grudgingly, have come to accept, and we welcome their conversion. We believe that at least 10 such teams should be established around the country and that they should deliberately target organised landlord fraud. We believe that all landlords who receive 20 or more direct payments should be investigated as a matter of course.

We believe that the finders keepers rule—which encourages competition rather than co-operation between the Benefits Agency and local authority fraud investigators—should end, so that we do not end up with the same investigators chasing the same fraud, thereby duplicating effort. We believe that there should be an automatic link to the tax system, so that information about all direct housing benefit payments made to landlords will automatically be passed by local authorities to the Inland Revenue. That would be a fairly powerful deterrent to landlords claiming housing benefit, which was not genuinely directed at the needs of a tenant.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin rose—

Mr. Smith: Finally, we believe that a proper monitoring system should be in place to ensure that local authorities fulfil their obligations in this respect. I see that the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) has now returned to the Chamber, so I shall give way to him.

Mr. Jenkin: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I did not leave the Chamber and that I was elsewhere in the Chamber. I am interested in the source of his innovative ideas, as they are familiar to me—the vast majority of them were put in the Social Security Committee's report by me and other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). Why is it that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has got all his ideas from the hon. Member for Birkenhead? Should not the hon. Member for Birkenhead be the shadow spokesman on social security? It is obvious that the Labour Front Bench does not have any ideas of its own.

Mr. Smith: I am proud that the Labour party has looked at the Social Security Committee's report, at the evidence that it received and at the sensible recommendations that it made. We want to implement its recommendations. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not leaping to his feet to defend the Select Committee—he is a member—and arguing that the Government ought to be implementing its recommendations, rather than dismissing them as a burden on landlords, or saying that this is a blanket operation that they will not adopt now, or saying that they will set up an inter-departmental ministerial working party to look at fraud. That has been the Government's response to what he and his colleagues have said. Instead of complaining about me picking up the Select Committee's report and running with it, he ought to be complaining loud and clear about the way in which his Government have not done that.

Mr. Jenkin rose—

Mr. Smith: A considerable number of our proposals for cutting down on landlord fraud go further than the Select Committee recommended. If the hon. Gentleman does not know the content of his own Select Committee's report, perhaps he ought to read it.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): My hon. Friend referred to monitoring. We have to address the issue of accountability. No single official at local authority level is responsible for the housing benefit budget. For example, in my local authority the official who was responsible for the operation of the system refused to accept responsibility for the housing benefit payments—£300 million—but accepted responsibility only for the administration. When it all went wrong and the official was moved elsewhere, it was as if no one was responsible for that huge sum.

This issue has to be dealt with—there has to be accountability at the local level, so that there is a proper reporting system from those responsible for administering the system, through to the local auditors, through to the Benefits Agency and then to the Secretary of State. It cannot be left as a paperwork exercise, as it is now.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend has made an extremely good point. Clear lines of accountability exist in some of the best local authorities. That is not the case in many local authorities. We should ensure that best practice is disseminated among local authorities so that proper accountability can be achieved. That could be accomplished through the monitoring procedures that we advocate.

Mr. Frank Field: The accounting officer is the chief officer in the agencies. That is the proper procedure which

I think should be followed in all spheres. For example, the Prime Minister, as First Lord of the Treasury, should be clearly accountable for the Budget and for any fraud. Similarly, the chief executive in local authorities should be the chief accounting officer who should be responsible for the money spent by that authority.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North–East): It is meaningless.

Mr. Smith: It is not meaningless, because my hon. Friend makes a precise point about accountability. If there is a clear responsibility attached to the most senior officer in the authority, the matter should receive proper attention. That is the key point that the hon. Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) should take into account.

The Government claim in their amendment and in some of their statements to the press in the past week or so that local authorities started taking fraud seriously only when the Government introduced incentives.

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Oliver Heald): Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith: The Minister chortles about that point, but it is untrue. Up to 1993, there was a specific disincentive in the system—which was put there deliberately by the Government—designed to hinder local authorities in the fight against fraud. In its January 1993 report entitled "Remote Control: the National Administration of Housing Benefit", the Audit Commission said:

"There are other perverse incentives which may place public money at risk. For example, the lower subsidy received for overpaid benefit means that an authority, which believes that it is unlikely to recover an overpayment, is better off if it ignores any evidence of possible overpayment. Since any benefit paid following a fraudulent claim is treated as an overpayment, this creates an incentive to ignore possible fraud."

In 1993, the Audit Commission made that clear analysis of the way in which the Government had created a system that actively discouraged local authorities from following up fraud. The Government then introduced a system of incentives that made the situation better. However, they are now making it worse again. None the less, in 1993 the Government recognised that there was a problem and they decided to improve incentives.

Although a discouragement was built into the system before 1993, local authorities up and down the country had an extremely good and active record of combating fraud. I shall give just three examples. Swansea introduced a separate fraud team in 1987 comprising two anti-fraud officers and clerical back-up. In 1990—three years before the Government woke up to the disincentives problem—it was increased to a team of four plus clerical support. In 1989, the borough of Camden set up a dedicated anti-fraud team of three staff, which was later expanded to four. It also began carrying out many residency checks, with home visits, prior to 1993.

The city of Southampton appointed its first full-time designated housing benefit fraud officer, with clerical support, in July 1991. Before then, it had an inner-city fraud team that examined housing benefit fraud and other fraud issues across the board. In April 1993, it appointed two further people to the team. The Government started collecting statistics on fraud, let alone doing anything about it, only in 1986, which was precisely when good authorities such as Swansea were already starting to take practical action to tackle the problem.

If the actions of individual local authorities were not enough, the London boroughs fraud investigators group, which draws together investigators from different London boroughs across the capital city, was set up in 1991. For four years, it called on the Government to set up a Londonwide anti-fraud team. Although it is pleased that the Government have now acceded—rather belatedly—to that request, it does not quite know why the Government took so long to wake up to the need for such a team. So when the Government try to claim, as they do in their amendment, that it is only because of the incentives that they have put in place that local authorities have started to tackle fraud, they are wrong. Local authorities were way ahead of the Government in the actions that they were taking.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman concede that weekly benefit savings have almost trebled since the incentive scheme came in, yet local authority associations, which are dominated by Labour, are saying that our increased targets are too high? Why is that? Will he condemn it?

Mr. Smith: The complaint that the local authorities are making is not that the targets are too high, but that the nature of the incentive system that the Government have put in place takes an incentive up to a certain ceiling and then gives much less of an incentive for local authorities to go beyond it. Local authorities have pointed out the flaws in the incentive mechanisms.

However, a new problem is about to hit us. It lies in the bringing forward of compulsory competitive tendering in housing benefit.

Mr. Pickles: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I will not give way; I have done so extremely generously, and must make some progress.

The advent of compulsory competitive tendering in housing benefit payments and, perhaps most alarmingly, in fraud investigation in local authorities, was revealed in a written answer to me from the Under–Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford):

"Our proposals for changes to the framework for compulsory competitive tendering for professional services include a proposal to raise the percentage of financial services work which must be exposed to competition from 35 per cent. to 65 per cent., and limit the availability of exemptions from CCT for authorities which cannot meet that requirement without exposing benefits work to competition. The legal definition of financial services work includes benefits work and relevant authorities may well choose to expose this work to competition in order to meet their competition requirements."—[Official Report, 12 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 163.]

If the Government are intent on forcing local authorities to put out to private tender the payment of housing benefit and council tax benefit, and the work to detect fraud in the receipt of those benefits, any shred of a pretence of having a serious anti-fraud strategy goes out of the window. Targeting organised landlord fraud, which is probably the biggest area in housing benefit fraud, takes highly skilled and trained professional investigators.

Mr. Pickles: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: It also requires a bona fide and entirely confidential exchange of information between local authorities and the Government. That is not the sort of activity that should even be considered for privatisation. Conservative Members do not seem to understand the enormous importance of the need to protect, with publicly accountable officers in charge, the confidentiality of information for the general public, while at the same time cracking down on fraud. That need must be paramount. If the Government force CCT on the payment of housing benefit or on fraud investigation, they are opening the gates to inadequate, sloppy procedures in investigation and the destruction of that important principle of confidentiality.

Mr. Pickles: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I will give way for the last time to the hon. Gentleman, who has been very persistent.

Mr. Pickles: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He is in danger of not fulfilling a promise that he made to me earlier. He promised that he would reconcile the statements made by the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) in July 1993 and by the hon. Gentleman at the Dispatch Box today. To remind him, three years ago the hon. Member for Withington made two substantive points. His first point was that there was a danger of overestimating the level of fraud—if the hon. Gentleman wants to check, the speech begins at column 1253 of Hansard on 16 July 1993—and his second point was that there was a danger of the incentive figures being set too high. If the hon. Gentleman would care to reconcile those figures, I would be most interested.

Mr. Smith: I gave the hon. Gentleman the answer for which he is looking when I spoke specifically about what the Audit Commission had said back in 1993 about the nature of the disincentives in the system at the time. I also draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the very fine words of the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People, the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), then the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, referring precisely to the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) on 16 July 1993. The hon. Member for Bury, North said:

"The Opposition spokesman has been equally determined to show that the Labour party is as rigorous about fraud and abuse as it is about ensuring that everyone gets his just deserts."—[Official Report, 16 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 1296.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Withington held that view at the time and he still holds that view.

The second area where the Government need to take some action is in stepping up the number of home visits that are made to claimants. Back in 1979, about 3.5 million home visits were made during the course of a year. In 1994, that figure was down to about 500,000, so the Government had made the situation much worse. Now the Government have realised that home visits are quite important, so they are stepping up a little bit the number of home visits that are made. Some 300,000 more home visits are now being made during the course of a year.

However, we believe that the Government should expand substantially the number of home visits that are made. Of course, there should be a dual purpose in visiting at home. There should be a determination to identify where a fraudulent claim is being made or paid, but there should also be a determination to ensure that people are receiving that to which they are properly and legitimately entitled. Accuracy in the spending of social security funds is a two-sided coin. That always used to be the purpose of home visiting under the previous Government, when 3.5 million home visits were made in the course of a year. It should continue to be the purpose of home visiting.

The work that has been done by the National Audit Office demonstrates clearly that, in terms of inaccuracy of payment of income support, the balance of inaccuracy weighs heavily to the current detriment of the Department rather than to its benefit.

We believe that the Benefits Agency can and should organise its home visits much more efficiently. Figures from the Department of Social Security show that the average cost per visit is £54. Yet the most efficient local authorities manage to achieve a far lower cost per visit.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will my hon. Friend comment on the experience of a constituent of mine? A few weeks ago, when a benefits fraud check was carried out in my constituency, two officers knocked on his front door at half-past 7 in the morning, entered and then knocked on his bedroom door until he woke up. This was a person about whom there was no suspicion whatever. He was in fact a perfectly legitimate claimant. Part of the debate should focus on the purpose of home visits, and we must ensure that people are not treated as if some kind of Gestapo was going around.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that, and she has written to me about the case.

We must ensure not only that home visits are conducted efficiently—to which I shall return in a moment—but that they are conducted in a manner that respects the liberties of the citizen, and that should be one of the elements of the system that the Department puts in place.

As I said, home visits could be organised more efficiently. The best local authorities have detailed software back-up, which provides all the information to ensure that the most is got out of every single visit: properties are grouped street by street and estate by estate, so that unnecessary travelling is avoided, and so on. That is the way in which they should be organised, and it is possible to achieve greater efficiency in doing so.

Mr. Lilley: Before the hon. Gentleman goes any further, will he confirm the figures given in his document on that subject, in which he says that he expects his fraud investigators to carry out 50 visits a day, which means that they will have eight minutes between ringing the bell on one door, completing the interview and ringing the bell on the next? How much time will be spent on benefit advice; how much time will be spent on fraud advice; and how serious does he consider that objective to be?

Mr. Smith: It is an entirely serious objective, because it is precisely what is being achieved by the best local authority officers who currently carry out home visits. Some home visits, of course, will be much shorter than that, but others will take longer. The Department's figures seem to assume that a visiting officer will sit down and talk through the entire life history of the claimant, his or her reading pattern, what films he or she last saw and the network of relationships of every single claimant in great detail over several cups of tea, taking several hours at a time. That is the current performance of investigators from the Department, but the best local authorities do it far more efficiently.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No, because I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman's boss.

The third area where the Government need to improve their performance is national insurance numbers. The Government have given us different totals at different times of the year, in different debates and different answers, for the precise number of national insurance numbers that are in circulation. We had an interesting answer on 5 March from the Under-Secretary of State, who said that it was all terribly simple. He said that there were two different computers, and that, yes, they had different totals on them. The national insurance recording computer system, which is based on contributions that are paid, contains 63.6 million records. The departmental central index system, which is based on entitlement to claim benefits, contains 77 million numbers.

Thanks to the clarity with which the Under-Secretary of State explained the arrangements to us, we all understand them. What the Government have so far failed to explain, however, is a discrepancy identified by the Select Committee. It relates to national insurance numbers classed as inactive because they belong to deceased persons. Although, by virtue of having existed, a deceased person must surely be listed on both computers, there are nearly 1 million more numbers on one computer than on the other. That is a dramatic disparity.

Even if the Government were able to explain why nearly 1 million numbers are unaccounted for, however, it would still be far too easy to establish a national insurance number and use it for fraudulent purposes. There is a good deal of organised big-time fraud at present: people with portfolios of national insurance numbers are using them to claim benefits to which they are not entitled because their identities are entirely fictitious. The swipe card technology which the Government are now introducing—and which we support—may bear down on the level of error in payments that are made, but it will not tackle the fundamental problem of the fraudulent obtaining of national insurance numbers.

The Government should take a series of steps to cleanse the national insurance number system of numbers that go astray in that way. They include greater vigilance in preventing people from using false identities to apply for national insurance numbers, and more frequent checks by the Contributions Agency to reconcile benefit claims with contributions paid. At present, such checks are carried out annually, and do not pick up frauds that intelligent fraudsters perpetrate between checks.

Local fraud investigators should be allowed access—currently denied—to the Contribution Agency's departmental central index. On-line data matching across departments should be introduced, with a timetable for rapid future progress. Special checks should be run on all inactive numbers, and there should be a flagging system to ensure that any number that is inactive for any reason is targeted. There should also be a special unit to co-ordinate the cleansing and investigation of all suspect numbers. The Government are coming up with some bits and pieces, but they are not yet doing enough.

We believe that the Government should deal with another small problem. It is highlighted by the case of Mr. Mark Lee, which was described in The Sunday Telegraph a couple of weeks ago. Mr. Lee, a convicted fraudster, had obtained a mortgage by fraudulent means and was sent to prison as a result, but the income support system continued to pay the interest on his mortgage, even though the mortgage had been fraudulently obtained. The Department of Social Security's answer was, "This is not a matter for us because there is no specific fraud in the claiming of benefit for the interest payment."

Clearly there is a loophole in the law. If the mortgage was obtained fraudulently, surely the taxpayer, via the Department of Social Security, should not be picking up the tab for keeping up the mortgage payments. The Government should urgently consider that matter, to find out how that legal loophole can be tightened.

In the past year or two, the Government have talked a lot about fraud. They have done a little bit about it. Labour Members welcome much of what they have done—the measures are sensible—but the Government are being far too self-congratulatory about what they have done. Their response to the Select Committee report is riddled with complacency. They are going backwards on what they have achieved because of their ideological attachment to compulsory competitive tendering.

The Government should adopt at the least the spread of measures proposed by the Select Committee. They should go further than that and embrace our recent ideas and proposals. There is far more to be done to tackle fraud, and it is a Labour Government who will set about doing it.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the priority given by Her Majesty's Government to tackling all aspects of benefit fraud; endorses the Government's successful work in detecting and preventing fraud which has resulted in the benefit savings target of £1.3 billion being exceeded in 1995–96; congratulates the Government on carrying out the first systematic review of the amount and type of Housing Benefit fraud; notes that Housing Benefit administration is the responsibility of local authorities and that local authorities only started tackling fraud seriously once the Government introduced financial incentives for them to do so; welcomes the new fraud strategy which will result in savings of £2.5 billion a year by 1999; deplores the Labour Party's attempt to exaggerate the amount of fraud as a pretext to spend more money; and condemns the Labour Party's continuing half-heartedness in tackling benefit fraud and abuse.'.

No one will be fooled by the cynical speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). He tried to con people that Labour is no longer soft on fraud and deliberately exaggerated the amount of fraud, so that Labour can pretend that its spending plans could be painlessly financed by cutting fraud. He wanted to disguise the flimsiness of that claim by peddling a plethora of spurious statistics and dubious detailed policies. His speech shows not the zeal of the convert, but the guile of the con man.

Rooting out fraud and abuse always has been, and remains, my top priority. I am happy to say that that was recognised by the Select Committee on Social Security, which said that the Secretary of State

"has shown himself to be"—

I pass over the kind remarks about my intellect and ability—

"the most determined to counter fraud".

Mr. Frank Field: It was better than that, but the Secretary of State's side toned it down.

Mr. Lilley: No: it responded to my natural modesty.

Since I became Secretary of State, we have saved record amounts on fraud, and we have plans to go on breaking those records year after year. In a moment, I will spell out what we have achieved and what we will achieve, but first I want to dismiss the ridiculous claim of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury that he and his party are—suddenly—tough on fraud.

The simple truth is that Labour has always been at best indifferent, and at worst hostile, to tackling benefit fraud. Nothing Labour Members have said today should be allowed to conceal that fact. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) castigated the Labour party for being and so it has. The fact that, before this debate, Labour has never initiated a debate on fraud illustrates its sheer indifference to the subject. When we have had such debates, Labour has invariably tried to play down the amount, and the importance of the issue.

I remember the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) accusing us of overstating the amount of fraud in the system. He argued that, even if our estimates were true, the amount was not significant. His words were:

"We should continually bear in mind the fact that, in the context of the overall budget, even £1 billion is not a large amount".

Today, the Labour Front-Bench team are

"overstating the amount of fraud in the system"

precisely because they now realise that £1 billion is a large amount, and they desperately need to conjure it up from somewhere to cover part of their spending plans.

Stopping housing benefit fraud is the responsibility of local authorities—most of which happen to be Labour. Most of them made little or no effort to tackle fraud—until I set each authority a target, backed by tough penalties and incentives, to galvanise it into action. In the first year, local authorities doubled the amount of fraud they detected, and increased the figure dramatically again the second year—yet members of Labour's Front Bench condemned those targets when I introduced them.

The hon. Member for Withington, Labour's Front-Bench spokesman at the time, said:

"the recovery targets set for local authorities are unrealistically high. I know that there is a lower level and a higher level, but my investigations across the country convince me that many local authorities will find it extremely difficult to hit even the lower targets . . . the Government have set the targets unrealistically high".—[Official Report, 16 July 1993; Vol. 228, c. 1254-55.]

Since then, the Opposition have opposed our measures to prevent abuse of housing and other benefits.

In January, we introduced a reform to ensure that taxpayers no longer pay rents in full to any new claimant who chooses to occupy a property with a rent above the average for the type of property suitable for the household in that area—and Labour opposed it. That measure will make collusive deals between landlord and tenant to rip off the taxpayer harder, yet Labour opposed it.

From the autumn, a further reform will ensure that housing benefit does not pay higher rents for unemployed young people than they would normally be able to afford out of work. Labour opposed that reform too, just as it opposed other measures to prevent abuse—such as the objective medical test for incapacity benefit, to stop fit people abusing the system, and the removal of entitlement to housing and other benefits from bogus asylum seekers.

Although Labour said that asylum seekers were mostly genuine and came to the United Kingdom to escape persecution, not to acquire our benefits, the figures tell a different story. Our benefit changes were made in February. The number of people claiming asylum in that month fell 7 per cent. below last year's level. In April, the figure was down a quarter, and in May it was down one half.

Of course it is too early to be certain that trend will be sustained, or whether it will be reinforced when the Asylum and Immigration Bill is enacted—but the first signs that the flow of bogus asylum claims is being stemmed are encouraging. That is good news above all for genuine refugees, as it will be easier to deal speedily with their claims.

The Opposition's indifference and hostility to tackling fraud is in marked contrast to our commitment and success. I have consistently given the issue the priority it deserves. I put in place the organisation to pursue fraud effectively, appointed a senior official with exclusive responsibilities, set up a fraud board and appointed a Minister with specific responsibility for tackling fraud—my excellent hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the Member for North Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald).

I developed for the first time a method of measuring the extent and incidence of fraud in each benefit. I increased funding for the fraud effort, and ring-fenced it against running cost cutbacks. I introduced home visits for new claims. I gave local authorities the incentives to tackle housing benefit fraud to which I have referred, plus extra guidance and help.

All those measure are already showing up in increasing success in detecting and stopping fraud. In each of the last four years, savings have exceeded targets—and targets have been sharply increased.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): Does the Minister, in his attack on fraud, intend to ensure that his party pays back the money paid to it by the fraudster Asil Nadir?

Mr. Lilley: That is not a responsibility of mine, and nor is it relevant to today's debate. One of my main responsibilities is dealing with the frauds perpetrated by Robert Maxwell—the only Labour Member ever to take a serious interest in occupational pensions.

Total savings for last year as a result of my measures are expected to exceed £1.3 billion, including some £220 million of fraud discovered by local authorities—which, together with the Benefits Agency, discovered about £390 million of housing benefit fraud over the past year. We know how much fraud is detected. The question is, how much at present remains undetected? If one is to plan an effective fraud protection strategy, it is essential to know how much fraud there is, of what kind and what type of fraudster commits it.

In the past, no Government in this country or abroad had succeeded in measuring fraud, but we have developed a reliable method of doing so. It involves taking a representative sample of claimants, examining all available information on each claimant, sending trained investigators to visit claimants at home, carrying out visits unannounced and repeatedly until contact is made or non-residence established, and requiring the claimant to prove his or her identity and facts relevant to the claim.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the Secretary of State set any parameters for the hours during which home visits should be made or for the conduct of the officials who make them?

Mr. Lilley: I will certainly look into the case that the hon. Lady mentioned earlier, which would not have been a routine visit. They are not made any more—any more than I imagine the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury intends 4 million such visits as part of his unbelievable campaign.

Mrs. Fyfe: I was talking about the spotlight campaign in Glasgow.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Lady reminds me that she opposed our spotlight campaign in Glasgow. Unlike her, a large number of Glasgow citizens co-operated with that campaign, which succeeded in making considerable savings.

Mrs. Fyfe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Secretary of State is in danger of misleading the House. I said that the Government should put as much energy into identifying people who are due benefits but not receiving them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): That matter has absolutely nothing to do with the Chair. The hon. Lady has been in the House long enough to know that there are other means of seeking such redress as she believes is appropriate.

Mr. Lilley: With the co-operation of the citizens of Glasgow, some £2.8 million has already been saved in that city, which means that we are better placed to meet the needs of genuine claimants in that part of the world.

Mr. Chris Smith: In the light of my hon. Friend's point of order, will the Secretary of State withdraw the slur against her views that he just perpetrated?

Mr. Lilley: If I have in any way slurred any hon. Member, of course I withdraw my remarks—but the hon. Lady gave the clear impression that she was not supportive of the spotlight campaign.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): She said money should not be spent on that campaign.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend recalls the hon. Lady saying that she thought money should not be spent that way. She may have said that.

Mrs. Fyfe: For the record, when the Secretary of State came to Glasgow specifically to blitz benefit fraud, I commented—and I stand by this—that the right hon. Gentleman would do well to put equal effort into assisting people who have been awarded benefits running into thousands of pounds but have not received them. Of course I do not condone fraud, but it is contemptible to chase people for fraud and do nothing about claimants who are due benefits.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Lady has done her best to save her reputation from her previous comments.

The systematic surveys undertaken by fraud officers have enabled them to establish the amount and type of fraud. The results show that about 10 per cent. of income support and housing benefit claims are fraudulent.

Criticisms of the survey methodology simply do not hold water. The interview was not a just a memory test, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said. It required documentary proof of identity and other facts. Far from ignoring landlord fraud, the survey was particularly well designed to detect it. The hon. Gentleman should understand enough about landlord fraud to know that it requires either a bogus property or a bogus tenant. Visits established with absolute certainty whether or not the property existed, and with near certainty whether the tenant was genuine. Finally, the methodology was endorsed by the National Audit Office.

I have no incentive to understate the amount of fraud. Indeed, until today, the Opposition have always accused me of exaggerating it. By contrast, Labour now has every incentive to exaggerate. It wants to appear tougher than the Government, so as to con people that it is no longer soft on fraud. Above all, it needs to conjure up imaginary "savings" to offset the real cost of its spending plans. That is why Labour Members leaped uncritically at the suggestion that housing benefit fraud could amount to £2 billion, instead of the £1 billion established by our rigorous and systematic study.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said that those are not the bases for Labour's figures, and that Labour Members do not endorse the £2 billion figure, but the Leader of the Opposition seized on that very figure in his speech in the Southwark cathedral series, which preceded my speech.

The £2 billion figure is, to say the least, flimsy. The figure is mentioned by the Select Committee in its report, but the Committee does not examine it, let alone endorse it. The figure relates to a guesstimate made by the local authority investigative officers group. It is not based on any systematic survey, representative sample or audited methodology.

[Mr. Lilley]

LAIOG members are professional investigators, but they are not trained in statistics, sampling or survey methodology. They sensibly target their efforts on areas in which they are most likely to detect fraud. However, they then scaled up the percentage of fraud found on those drives and applied it to the population as a whole. In other words, the LAIOG figures vastly exaggerate the amount of fraud.

For the Opposition to set aside an audited, thorough figure for that type of guesstimate is irresponsible, and demonstrates that they are less interested in truth than in propaganda.

Today the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury placed much weight on a single survey carried out by Haringey into 15 highlighted cases, and mentioned fraud levels of up to 50 per cent. Haringey claims that there is a very high level of fraud in its area, and has increased significantly the amount of fraud it has discovered since I gave it incentives and subjected it to penalties if it failed to do so. But the total amount of fraud it detects and stops is less than 3 per cent. of its housing benefit budget.

Across its budget, Haringey does not seem to have identified, let alone stopped, the levels of fraud suggested by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Perhaps he would care to explain the discrepancy between the figures he gave and the average savings that Haringey is achieving.

Mr. Frank Field rose—

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) rushes to his aid.

Mr. Field: The Secretary of State realises perfectly well that Haringey has, sensibly, started in those areas in which it will gain the biggest rewards for taxpayers. As he is almost limbering up to attack and to dismiss the Haringey survey, as he did before the Select Committee, would he like to provide us with evidence from other local authorities that have conducted similar surveys on landlords with many claims, and have come up with figures different from Haringey's?

Mr. Lilley: In a moment, I shall mention the figures produced by the London fraud investigators group, which believes that, in total, there is £40 million of landlord fraud in London. That figure is based on figures from its members in London, and it tallies with our figures.

Mr. Field: I am sure that the Secretary of State will quote that figure again shortly, but it does not answer the question that I asked him. Because he was knocking the Haringey survey, I asked him whether he could cite a single survey from elsewhere that deals with the same problem and the same issue—landlords with many housing benefit claims—that disproves Haringey's figures? Can he or can he not do so?

Mr. Lilley: I am not trying to knock the figures provided by Haringey. I am suggesting that its figures relating to a section of its claims—the percentage of fraud discovered—should not be used across all claimants in the borough, and even less so for all claimants in the nation. That is the only point that I am making. I have no doubt that there will be subsections of claimants in any borough with a very high level of fraud and abuse, and it is right and proper that fraud officers should target them and make them their first priority.

Mr. Field: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for distancing himself from his Back Benchers by making a clear statement to the House that he thinks that landlords with large numbers of properties are a real problem, and that fraud among that group should not be taken as representative of fraud among all claimants.

Mr. Lilley: Some landlords with many tenants are a problem, but, of course, the landlords with the most tenants are councils and housing associations. There are some very reputable large private landlords, and it is as absurd to lump them all together as it would be to try to blackguard the name of all housing benefit claimants.

The Opposition, having seized on the flimsy figure of an extra £1 billion of fraud, then had to invent even flimsier claims that they could get it back. So they put together three rather tenuous fraud programmes, and plucked savings estimates for each of them out of the air. By an extraordinary coincidence, the savings from those three fraud programmes add up to exactly £1 billion.

Today, it was noticeable that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury singularly failed to defend or even to mention the detailed savings figures, which, elsewhere, he has proposed are realistic.

He proposes, first, to get back an additional £310 million of landlord fraud. The problem is that, on all the best evidence, in total there is only about £150 million of landlord fraud. That figure emerged from our survey, and, as I mentioned, our survey should be particularly accurate in identifying and estimating the amount of landlord fraud.

As I said, our estimate is also consistent with the estimate of the London fraud investigators group, which believes that there is about £40 million of landlord fraud in London, where it is particularly rife. London accounts for a fifth of all properties; therefore, grossing up—but allowing for a slightly higher rate in London—produces a similar figure. So it is simply impossible for Labour to save an extra £310 million when there is only £150 million of such fraud to be stopped. One cannot get a quart out of a pint pot

Labour proposes a programme of 4 million home visits to all benefit claimants. Allegedly that would save an extra £520 million net of the cost of those visits, over and above the savings that we intend to make. But we know from our surveys that about 10 per cent. of claimants are defrauding the system. To visit 100 per cent. of claimants, therefore, means 90 per cent. of visits will be wasted or ineffectual.

We want to target visits so as to catch likely fraudsters, but to minimise ineffective and costly visits. Therefore, I initiated a programme to visit almost a third of all income support claimants each year, including 600,000 visits to check existing claimants. Those visits will be targeted on likely fraud, using the most powerful data matching system in Europe.

Visits need to be thorough to be effective, which takes time and costs money. Our visits take an average of 80 minutes, cover about 80 questions and cost £21 each.

However, Labour's proposal—which is quite explicit in its document—relies on each investigator doing 50 visits a day, at a cost of £3 each. That means that the investigator will have only eight minutes to move from one address to the next and to carry out the interview. It might be possible for my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe), sprinting fast between doors, to achieve that.

I challenge the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury to tell us what identity checks he proposes to undertake in the fewer than eight minutes that will be available. What documentary proof must be found by their breathless investigators? What further proof will be required of other facts in the claim? Will investigators return if no one is in? My understanding is that Haringey counts "no one at home" as an effective visit. Can he confirm that his proposals rest on the same assumption?

Mr. Frank Field rose—

Mr. Lilley: I shall give the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury a chance to gird himself to answer the question.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Secretary of State asks a direct question, so it is perhaps courteous to give him a direct answer. Of course the system used by Haringey and other local authorities—because it groups properties by area, and achieves very great efficiency by doing so—means that some people who are out are not visited again immediately. Then, of course, one goes back to that area and tries again. The important thing is the grouping of property by street and area, so that efficient visiting can take place and the cost to the taxpayer can be reduced. That does not happen now with the DSS, which is grossly inefficient in its organisation, but it does happen in the most efficient local authorities.

Mr. Lilley: I can correct the hon. Gentleman's error. We operate a similar system of grouping—

Mr. Smith: At vastly greater cost.

Mr. Lilley: That is because they take 80 minutes, not eight. That is the big difference. Subsequently, we follow up the work that we have done.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury proposes to save an extra £170 million from stopping abuse of national insurance numbers. He implied that there must be national insurance number fraud because there are more NINOs than people in the United Kingdom. We keep the national insurance numbers of dead and emigrated people, not least to prevent fraud.

The reason there are more dead people on the departmental central index computer than on the national insurance records computer is that, as well as including those with national insurance contributions, the DCI computer includes those who make benefit claims but have no national insurance record. It keeps records of them when they are dead. I hope that that sets to rest the hon. Gentleman's spurious point about the difference in the numbers.

What is more, the records are clearly marked, so that, if someone tries to claim on a dead person's national insurance number, alarm bells ring. We do not pay them benefit unless they happen to be called Lazarus.

Mr. Frank Field: Mr. and Mrs. Lazarus.

Mr. Lilley: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that all our evidence suggests that resurrection is a rare phenomenon in this country at this time.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, who is obviously busy trying to find support for his spurious points, assumes that one national insurance number in 500 is involved in identity fraud. The only justification for that number is to arrive at the hon. Gentleman's spurious savings figure of £1 billion. One United Kingdom citizen in 500 implies some 110,000 people, which would mean that one income support claimant in 50 was using a false national insurance number. There is no evidence that multiple identity fraud is that extensive.

It is not easy to get a new national insurance number. The applicant must first explain why he does not have one already, because virtually every British-born citizen is allocated a number as a consequence of the child benefit system. The fraudster must usually claim to be from abroad. If they claim to be from the European Economic Area or a British citizen brought up abroad, they will now have to pass the habitual residence test.

That route is distinctly unattractive for the multiple identity fraudster, but it would be reopened by the Opposition, who propose to abolish the habitual residence test. [Interruption.] Oh, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said that he does not intend to abolish that test.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Secretary of State said that the Opposition have promised to repeal the habitual residence test. When? Where? What is his evidence?

Mr. Lilley: I am prepared to accept the hon. Gentleman sedentary comment, which he did not repeat, that the Opposition now say that they will not repeal it.

Mr. Smith: Give us the evidence.

Mr. Lilley: Quite honestly, I thought that the Opposition had promised to repeal it. I will check in the Official Report to see whether that is so. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that they intend to keep it, that is interesting. If he is saying that they do not know, that is as ineffective and will have much the same effect as his lamentable failure to answer the questions on "Newsnight" the other evening. I suggest that in future, for this sort of debate, he should find out what his party's policies are before criticising ours.

The alternative to claiming to be someone who is subject to the habitual residence test is to claim to be an asylum seeker. There are currently 46,000 asylum seekers claiming benefit, which is far short of the 110,000 people the Opposition claim are involved in national insurance number fraud, even if all of them were fraudsters using multiple identities.

Alternatively, the Opposition's multiple identity fraudsters must be involved in what is called piggy-back fraud, which means that they pretend to be a citizen who is not currently claiming benefit. That sort of fraud would have been exposed by the identity checks during our fraud survey. If Labour's estimate of one in 50 claimants was correct, 100 of our 5,000 sample would have been found to be involved in those frauds. In fact, the survey showed that only two were involved in such fraud. There may also have been some in the non-resident category who were involved in multiple identity claims, but they would have been picked up in our estimate of the total of fraud.

En passant, I should mention that, under the type of home visiting proposed by the Opposition, non-resident fraud will not be established, because the visitor will simply note down "not at home" and will not go back. We go back repeatedly until we establish contact with the person or non-residency.

The comprehensive measures to combat this type of fraud, of which tightening up on all aspects of NINO issues is important but only a partial element, will eliminate a large part of the national insurance number fraud that already takes place. Any genuine element within Labour's figures simply represents double counting of the savings for which we are already budgeting.

Since I became Secretary of State, we have been unprecedentedly successful in tackling benefit fraud, but I want to exceed our successes. That is why, last year, I announced a comprehensive fraud strategy for the next five years. We are already implementing that programme with investment and information technology. We are increasing the resources that we devote to fraud. This year, we are making home visits to a third of all income support claimants to reduce the risk of fraud, and we are also spotlighting different parts of the country for intensive fraud efforts. Early returns from Operation Spotlight suggest that it is already having excellent results, not just in Glasgow.

We are investing heavily in state-of-the-art technology. We are setting up a new computer system to enable us to match and verify housing benefit claims in different parts of the country. Last month, I announced the winning consortium to develop the new benefit payment card. That will mean that claimants no longer have to carry valuable order books around with them, and will largely eliminate fraud by people stealing or forging order books and girocheques.

Cumulatively, my new fraud strategy should be saving £2.5 billion a year before the end of the century. That will help to control the cost of the welfare state, and will help us to continue to support the people who need it.

Labour's document on fraud contained the first detailed proposals to emerge from the party's interminable review of social security.

Mr. Chris Smith: Before the Secretary of State finishes dealing with the figures, perhaps he might like to correct what I am sure was an inadvertent error in what he told the House earlier.

He said that Haringey's savings from its work on fraud amounted to only 3 per cent. of its budget. As I understand it, the savings achieved so far—we are not yet at the end of the process—amount to £6.5 million out of an overall housing benefit budget for the borough of £120 million. That means that the figure is more like 5 per cent. than the 3 per cent. that the Secretary of State gave. I hope that he will seek the leave of the House to correct that information.

Mr. Lilley: I was using the figure for the last full year that has been reported. The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that, in 1995-96, the figure is £6.4 million—not £6.5 million—but the total housing benefit fraud has not yet been reported. It is still only a fraction of the level that he tried to suggest existed. He should apologise to the House for the impression that he has falsely created.

Labour's document on fraud contains the first detailed proposals to emerge from its interminable review of social security. Six months ago, the hon. Gentleman promised that he would think the unthinkable. In his document, he has merely produced the unoriginal, the unworkable and the unscrupulous.

The issues in fraud are simple. We need to understand the amount and type of fraud. We need to provide the right incentives to encourage local authorities to tackle it, and to deploy the Government's anti-fraud resources to give the best value for money. Labour fails on all three counts. It deliberately exaggerates the amount of fraud, ignores the role of local authorities and proposes to squander taxpayer's money on tasks that would have negligible returns. It ducks the real issues and offers quack remedies.

If Labour fails so spectacularly on fraud, where the issues are simple, how can it hope to offer solutions to the more complex challenges of the welfare system, such as helping people off welfare and into work? Indeed, how can a party so incompetent even in opposition possibly claim to offer competence in Government? However, Labour's fraud policies are not just incompetent: they are fraudulent. Bogusly high fraud figures offer bogus finance for all too genuine spending plans. The higher the fraud numbers it claims, the deeper it will have to dig into our pockets when, if it is elected, it has to implement policies that it cannot finance.

Our fraud programme, by contrast, is based on real numbers and real action. Tackling fraud has always been my top priority, and it will go on being my top priority. We have already achieved record savings, and we plan to break those records again. Our fraud programme means that help can be given to the people who need it and that taxpayers can afford to give that help. Our policies aim to keep fraudulent claimants off benefit, and to keep fraudulent politicians out of office.

5.11 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Secretary of State's response was somewhat uncertain. I am sorry that he was not able to read the original comments that I drafted for the Select Committee report. They were much more favourable to him than those that appeared. The problem is that Conservative members of the Committee always think that the Chairman is up to some plot when such words appear, so they watered down my comments. I am happy to explain that there is no plot and pay him credit because, in respect of tackling fraud, he is the most serious figure to hold his office.

We must understand why the Secretary of State is so anxious about this debate and his response to the Select Committee report. He has a difficult task. It was not merely to wrong-foot him that our first report was on housing benefit fraud. We did not intend to make him look soft on fraud or the causes of fraud, although some of the interventions of Conservative Back Benchers in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) suggest that that is the image that is being put over to the country. Rather, the Select Committee was anxious to change the House's image in respect of fraud and to bring it into line with the image that most voters have of fraud.

The report was meant to concentrate minds on the fact that it would be amazing if there were little fraud when the largest single departmental budget—of more than £90 billion—is involved. We suggest that fraud is very large indeed. I do not fall for the Secretary of State's trick question about what I would suggest the level of fraud is. By its nature, we can never know the extent of fraud in a system. Good government requires, as does the defence of freedom, that we should be vigilant all the time and seek new ways to crack down on fraud.

The report said that the country's image of fraud as having a dual nature is correct. An element of serious criminal fraud operates against our budgets, an aspect to which I shall return in a moment. In examining housing benefit fraud, we had, because of its nature, to concentrate on landlords because that benefit is peculiar in that, although it helps claimants, it is often paid direct to the landlords. In doing that, I have no wish to put forward the image that claimants do not commit fraud; they do and that is wrong. We may sympathise more with those who have few funds who commit fraud when compared with those who have large funds who commit it, but fraud is wrong whoever does it.

In case there is any doubt in the House, I shall read a letter that I received today from someone who did not know about today's debate. She wanted to relay her anguish about her experiences and wrote:

"Do you and others at Westminster know the depth of my anger and anguish when I stand in line in the Post Office to pay £2.95 to send a letter by special delivery and at the same time watch a foreigner in front of me collect seven £10 notes and take his mobile phone out of his bag? I am just one of those contributing towards the £70 but could not afford a mobile phone or the cost of the calls. I want to know when anyone is going to do something about all this because I know the people of this country are being destroyed. I write to you although I know Peter Lilley is actually the man in charge".

There is fraud that is committed by determined individuals who should not be claiming such benefits and there are people in gangs who commit fraud against our budget. There is also a third category of people who do small jobs on the side, or who have boyfriends and do not declare them. Most of my firepower is directed at those claimants who deliberately work the system and commit fraud, and at the gangs.

The report aimed to change the image of the House's concern with fraud away from one that was concentrated on individuals towards the serious criminal fraud element that operates against the social security budget. The Secretary of State was careful not to say that the Select Committee was wrong to estimate the figure at £2 billion because no one knows what figure for fraud he will find next year. He was anxious not to knock his feet away in case he is able to say before the general election that £2 billion is the figure involved. Such figures grossly underestimate the element of serious criminal fraud in our system.

I want to dwell on three points that show why I am worried. The Secretary of State has commissioned the most expensive investment programme that any Department has introduced so that we can have smartcards in the system. The group that has won the contract gave the Select Committee a seminar about how the process will work. It was at pains to point out that it is responsible for security, once it has been told that somebody should be paid, until the actual payment.

If I am right in saying that the Secretary of State underestimates the extent of organised fraud against our system, the new and expensive smartcard system will be given many instructions to pay benefit to people who should not get it. In other words, taxpayers will pay a massive sum to invest in high technology that will make it easier rather than more difficult for people to commit fraud in claiming benefits to which they are not entitled. It will, we hope, prevent some fraud in stolen giros and impersonations, but it will not deal with fraud committed before that part of the operation. That is the part on which I am concentrating. [Interruption.] The Secretary of State disagrees from a sedentary position. I am happy to give way if he wants to put something officially on the record. Time will tell which of us is right—those who disagree from a sedentary position or those who are on their feet. That is the first issue.

The second issue is our national insurance numbers. I go much further than the careful and cautious remarks that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury made to the House today. I believe that our national insurance number system has been overrun. At some stage, the Government will have to face up to that and introduce a new system. They will need identity checks, fingerprinting and DNA testing for such a system. That is how large I believe the overrunning of the system is. It is not the system's fault, for of course it was born in 1948 to serve another purpose than the service that it now carries out, which is both to allot benefits and, in some instances at least, we hope, prevent fraud.

The third issue of concern is the impossibility that the Secretary of State faces in getting any one of those wonderful computers in any one area talking to computers in other areas. He was at pains today to blame Labour councillors for not jumping to and responding more vigorously to the incentives that he now gives to crack down on fraud in the housing benefit system. However, his Government introduced the housing benefit system and allowed the anarchy that we now face to reign.

Some hon. Members may be shocked to know that the Government allowed every local authority to design its own form. So the forms ask different questions in different ways of different claimants. In those circumstances, it is impossible to do a data-matching exercise without incurring massive costs. So, although the Secretary of State wants computers to talk to computers, as he and the House will know, they can do so only in one area—Westminster. The data in that borough are such that the computers can talk to one another; but computers cannot talk across borough boundaries.

The carelessness and casualness of the Government in designing the housing benefit system, the faults which they are trying to blame on other people, are such that it is difficult to crack down on the extent of fraud that we believe exists in the current system.

I end with a challenge. The Secretary of State was kind to the Select Committee report in his comments today. How else could he respond, for there is a Conservative majority on the Committee? Once or twice he had a go at us. That was fair enough. He suggested obliquely here and there that perhaps we had not probed our evidence properly or that we had been too simple or trustful in accepting the figures that we put in our report. So let the debate be joined properly.

The Secretary of State is giving challenge money to local authorities to help them improve their fraud prevention techniques. Will he allot some to the Select Committee so that we can undertake some of the surveys that we would have liked to undertake? To take one example that he mentioned, we could find out whether the piggy-backing that he described in the national insurance system is as small a problem as he suggested. I believe that it is much more serious. The Secretary of State was right to say that we did not have the resources to conduct the detailed memory plus other survey that his Department conducted.

I make a plea in the debate tonight that the Select Committee should receive challenge money so that we can more seriously set about our business in defining the true proportions of fraud. The aim of the Select Committee report was to change the debate—hence the unease of the Secretary of State—away from the idea that much fraud is committed by individual claimants. Although the Secretary of State did not suggest that most fraudulent claimants acted in Labour-controlled areas, we know his line of thought. The report showed that there was another side to fraud.

The housing benefit budget is the largest of all Government budgets. It is inconceivable that it is not under attack by serious criminal fraud. We said in the report that it was. We listed four whole pages of recommendations, most of which the Secretary of State says he is still thinking about. The question that taxpayers are asking is: when will the Secretary of State make up his mind?

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): There is no real disparity of intent or objective between the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Indeed, the principal purpose of the rhetoric adopted by our report was to encourage vigilance and to test assumptions. I make no apology to my right hon. Friend for being part of the exercise to challenge things that are currently accepted as true, to test the validity of arguments and to come up with new ideas.

I wish to point out the place of the figure of £2 billion in that report. It does not appear in any written evidence that we received. Although it features in our findings, it does not appear in the relevant paragraphs to which the summary of findings refers. The figure of £2 billion was not even uttered by the man who gave evidence when it entered the debate.

The figure of £2 billion came from the hon. Member and my former hon. Friend—I use the word "former" in the merely technical sense—the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). On page 56 of the evidence, the hon. Gentleman himself extrapolated the figure from comments made by Mr. Webster of the Local Authority Investigation Officers Group, saying:

"But we are talking here of trivial sums"—

hon. Members will understand that he was using the term in its ironic sense.

"If your assessment of the scale of fraud is right, the totality of fraud is somewhere nearer £2 billion."

Mr. Webster replied:

"I agree with you."

The figure was introduced into the debate by a Labour Member of Parliament. The witness was led into talking about a possible figure of £2 billion. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State rightly says, it is not based on any scientific or methodological survey.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State also said, if one extrapolates to the entire United Kingdom figures from one of the worst boroughs, which is targeting some of the worst properties in London, one might reach such a figure. Until we have harder and firmer evidence, it would be irresponsible to base policy on that extrapolated figure. Yet that is exactly what the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has done. He has changed his whole policy as a result of that extrapolation by one of his hon. Friends, not even uttered by the witness who was being interviewed at the time.

Mr. Chris Smith: I note that it is in paragraphs 49 to 51 of the Select Committee report that the figure of £2 billion is adumbrated. I have never endorsed that figure as a specific figure, but the hon. Gentleman suggests that I have for the purposes of his argument. I notice in the proceedings of the Committee an item that says:

"Paragraphs 23 to 58 read and agreed to."

The hon. Gentleman agreed to those paragraphs. Why is he now disagreeing with something that he agreed to when the Committee report was accepted?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman's problem is that he cannot see the difference between a speculative guess, used tentatively to highlight the potential for fraud, based on what one witness said, and a hard and fast figure. Although he says that he has never endorsed the figure, he appears to have adjusted his party's policy on the basis that it is gospel. That is nothing short of hypocrisy—if I may use that term.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Does my hon. Friend accept from me, as a fellow member of the Social Security Select Committee, that what we were trying to do was to come up with an order of magnitude of fraud in relation to total housing benefit of £10 billion? We were considering the possibility that fraud might be higher than the £1 billion that many people were accepting, and whether it could be as high as £2 billion. We were trying to consider all the implications of that in relation to a total figure of about £10 billion, but in my view we never said that it was a hard and fast figure that could be relied upon. We were simply trying to ensure that it was not £3 billion, £4 billion, £5 billion, £6 billion, £7 billion, £8 billion or £9 billion.

Mr. Jenkin: With some qualifications, I agree with my hon. Friend. The important reason for including the figure in the report was to attract attention to the problem of social security fraud, to encourage vigilance and to encourage a questioning and exploratory attitude. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has exemplified such an attitude in his quest to deal with the problem of social security fraud, and the hon. Member for Birkenhead has given a lead in promoting such an attitude, but that attitude was consistently resisted by Labour Front Benchers until suddenly they recognised that there might be a political opportunity in it. That typifies the way that the so-called new Labour party works; it is all for effect and there is little substance behind it.

Mr. Frank Field: Would it not help us to gather evidence, and thereby help the debate, if the Secretary of State gave the Select Committee some challenge money, so that, for example, we could study the hon. Gentleman's constituency to discover the extent of fraud there, and study my constituency and four others with different characteristics throughout the country? Then we would be in a better position to know whether the problem is localised, as the hon. Gentleman would say, in bad authorities, or whether the bad people are evenly spread throughout the country.

Mr. Jenkin: I think the hon. Gentleman is trying to bribe me with my own Government's money. Of course I very much like the idea of the Select Committee on which I serve becoming an agency of the Government, but that would be contrary to the spirit of independence of Select Committees from the Executive, and it would be a precedent-setting event if such a thing were to occur.

Nevertheless, I very much hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State listened to what the hon. Gentleman said in his speech about the type of survey evidence that is necessary. Surveys are cheap compared to the costs of social security fraud, and I very much hope that, specifically, survey evidence on the security of the national insurance number system might be undertaken, to give confidence in the system if confidence is due and to expose how we might better police the system if that proves necessary. The questions have been asked, and surely it is the Government's duty to ensure that we have either confidence or action.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My hon. Friend, serving on the Select Committee, has vastly more knowledge of this complicated subject than I do. When the continuing spotlight programme on benefit fraud is introduced to constituencies such as mine, which has finite boundaries, if its results are known, it should surely be possible to extrapolate from those figures a figure per thousand benefit claimants. Surely that would not be a million miles, statistically, from the reality.

Mr. Jenkin: I think that that is right, depending on the nature of the area surveyed. The important thing about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's survey of housing benefit fraud, which included 5,000 respondents, was that it was based on a genuinely random sample, not selected from one specific authority. The survey was genuinely investigative; the strings were pulled until the investigators found what was on the end of them. Therefore, it could reasonably be taken to be a fair picture of social security fraud—at least, the fairest concrete picture that is as yet available to us. It produced the figure of £1 billion, on which it is prudent to base policy, not a more inflated figure, which was speculative and was included in our report to promote debate and questioning rather than as a basis for policy and recommendations.

Mr. Barry Field: There does not seem to be, in the Select Committee, or across the Floor of the House, much disagreement about the fact that housing benefit is one of the major areas of fraud and that there has been tremendous growth in the payment of that benefit. Has the Select Committee considered the possibility of making direct payments the norm, on the basis that landlords own fixed assets so they are not transient and do not move around? One might have a starred service for the better landlords, to whom direct payment was made.

Instead, that is currently at the discretion of the local authority. In the Isle of Wight, we had a very good system. Now that we have a unitary authority, it has scrapped it and returned to paying the money to tenants, who are often vulnerable and on the move. That is where a great problem occurs with the type of fraud that I am sure the Select Committee has considered.

Mr. Jenkin: Whether the local authority pays housing benefit direct to the tenant or direct to the landlord, it is obviously essential that there should be an actual building and a real tenant with a genuine national insurance number and a genuine basis for a housing benefit claim, that the amounts claimed should be the amounts that are required and fairly due in rent, and that there should be no skimming off in between.

I do not know whether it is possible or desirable to make it the norm to pay the landlord rather than the tenant, because very often the tenant might pay at a slightly different time from when the landlord expects the rent. I think that that matter should be at the discretion of local authorities, although I am interested to know what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for North Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald), might say about the suggestion when he replies to the debate.

I was pleased to support the report because it encourages the questioning attitude that I have discussed, but I was especially pleased with the Government's pretty generous response to that report. Of 33 recommendations—I notice the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury sniggering—only six were totally rejected. Eleven were fully accepted, eight were partly accepted and six are still under consideration. That is not a bad record of influence for a Select Committee—certainly not one to be sneered at, or one to suggest that the Government are resistant to many of our suggestions.

One recommendation is vital for combating that type of fraud, or frauds where there are technical breaches or technical impersonation, where the statutory requirements of the payment of benefit are being manufactured. I refer to on-line data matching. The private sector uses vast computer systems to handle vast numbers of transactions. The banking automated transfer system must handle a huge number of transactions; and the credit card companies use a single processing centre located in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess).

It should therefore be possible, once it has been decided what to pay and whom to pay it to, to put all the information into a single live database system, so that anyone can look up a national insurance number and see what is coming in and what is going out—including all benefits. That must be the objective. The Secretary of State has kindly accepted it as such, but has refrained from issuing a timetable for its implementation.

[Mr. Jenkin]

I wish to press the Minister on one point: there should be a target date for putting all receipts of national insurance and all payments of insured and uninsured benefits on one computer system, so that people can see, at the flick of a switch, what is going on in individual accounts. That is why we recommended that people should be sent an account of their national insurance contributions and claims at least once a year—so that they can see for themselves what is being paid in and what they are claiming. If someone who should not be claiming has been claiming, that would quickly become apparent, and we would gain a great deal of information about false claims for insured benefits.

I understand the Government's reticence about pursuing this recommendation. As soon as we start sending people information of this kind, many of them will of course write in for further information, and supplying it will cost the Government a great deal of money. That, however, is not a reason in the long term for not setting up such a system. People increasingly believe that they have a right to such information. They feel a sense of ownership, in terms of what they have contributed to the national insurance system. If we are not prepared to reinforce people's sense of ownership, that will serve merely to underline another fraudulent aspect of the system, which is the fact that people's contributions are really just another form of tax to be distributed by the Government at their own behest, for their own convenience and for their own purposes. All we are really buying in return for our contributions, runs this argument, are the promises of future Governments, which will not necessarily be honoured.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead touched briefly on the wider nature of social security fraud, but the Select Committee dealt extensively with that matter in its report, published on 1 November 1995, on the work of the Department of Social Security and its agencies. The worst fraud perpetrated on beneficiaries of the system lies not in the encouragement to falsify, lie and defraud in a technical sense but in the system's perverse incentives to adjust one's circumstances in such a way that one becomes genuinely eligible for benefits. That is the most corrupting aspect of the system.

It should come as no surprise to find that a state bureaucracy responsible for handing out £90 billion can encounter technical problems. We Conservatives do not believe in the efficacy of the command economy, but that is what the benefits system amounts to at the moment. The system encourages disincentives to work—a fact that the Secretary of State seems to have acknowledged by starting to reduce the advantages that some single mothers appear to derive from the benefits system. Built into the system are some perverse incentives, encouraging the creation of what Charles Murray has termed "an underclass". Its members live a completely different life style; no longer do they have any incentive to look for work or to rely on themselves: they become genuinely state-dependent.

That is the true fraud being perpetrated on so many people. We should applaud and encourage those who climb out of state dependency, and we should look for ways of shaping the future benefits system so as to avoid these detrimental effects. People must have a much more genuine stake in what they have invested in the welfare system, thereby giving them more incentives both to save and to work.

Those ideas have been assiduously encouraged by the Adam Smith project on the future of welfare, and would be further encouraged by developing its system of fortune accounts. Every individual would have a fortune account, not the dead letter box that his current national insurance number represents. Such an account would show the money that a person had accumulated over a lifetime, for pensions and for unfortunate eventualities such as disability or permanent illness.

On his recent visit from Chile, Mr. Piniera, the former Social Security Minister of that country, explained how he had introduced such a system there. It would do away with a great deal of fraud and with many of the incentives to fraud and corruption. It would also increase work incentives and improve the economy's savings ratio. That is exactly what we want: a system that does away with fraud by policing it effectively and by creating the right incentives to work.

I hope that the people listening to the debate will not be taken in by the speech made today by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury—it was the sort of fraud we can do without. What we need is a debate as good as the one between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Birkenhead. That would be much better than hearing the ideas that the hon. Gentleman has lent his Front-Bench colleagues to give their arguments a semblance of respectability. Failing that, we shall be destined always to hear a false debate that will lead nowhere—a debate more interested in presentation than substance. Such a debate, if led by Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen, would certainly fail the nation.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I welcome the chance to discuss benefit fraud again, even though we debated it a short while ago. It is a matter of such significance that it warrants another debate.

Benefit fraud undermines confidence in the welfare state. We should not just discuss it; we must take action to prevent it. Housing benefit fraud is a responsibility of local authorities. Whether it amounts to £1 billion or £2 billion, the amount of fraud is still immense. I should like to dwell on the survey done by the Department of Social Security which states that one in five claims is fraudulent or incorrectly based; and that housing benefit errors and frauds are worth £840 million a year. That is immense, even if we take those figures. Fraud was £730 million. As I said, that is bad enough, but when we take into account housing benefit fraud when it is linked to the payment of income support, the figure goes up. The Government have quoted the figure of £1 billion. Of that, £900 million is fraud. As we have heard today, the Social Security Committee said that it could be as high as £2 billion. Whatever the figure, we have to do something to combat that fraud.

Let us look at what local authorities are actually doing. Last month, there was a report—an academic study—by the unit for the study of white collar crime at the Liverpool business school at John Moores university. It sent out survey questionnaires to 360 district, metropolitan and London boroughs. The return rate was 40 per cent., which I believe was quite good. The report said what the savings were. I would like to blow the trumpet of Liberal Democrat authorities here—Liberal Democrat savings were 2.3 per cent.; the Conservatives' 2.2 per cent.; and Labour's 1.44 per cent.

It was also said in the survey that the fraud investigators in Liberal Democrat authorities actually performed better. The weekly benefit savings were per investigator. In Liberal Democrat authorities, the weekly benefit saving was £209,755; in Labour authorities it was £191,248; and in Conservative authorities it was £179,010. I would like to look at the reasons why this could be the case. One of the main reasons is that Liberal Democrat authorities have employed fraud investigators for longer.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: It could be that there is less fraud under Conservative authorities. I am not saying that that is any particular credit to Conservative authorities—it could be a reflection on the areas concerned. It could be a reflection on all manner of things. There could be less fraud in Conservative authorities—although I admit that there is only a small number of them at the moment.

Ms Lynne: Yes, there is a very small number of Conservative authorities at the moment—and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman accepts that fact. I was quoting figures for the amount of housing benefit paid within that area. For the Liberal Democrats, it was 2.3 per cent. of the amount of housing benefit paid within that area, and for the Conservatives it was 2.2 per cent—the hon. Member cannot get away with that argument.

Tackling benefit fraud is not just a matter for local authorities; it is a matter for Government Departments as well. I believe that there should be greater co-operation between Government Departments and local authorities. Perhaps if there was greater co-operation, we would get away from the large-scale fraud that we have at the moment. If more fraudsters—I am talking about landlord fraudsters—ended up with convictions, it might be an actual deterrent.

We are not talking about some small-time crime, we are not talking about the individual who defrauds housing benefit—even though that is serious—we are talking about landlords on a large scale who are ripping off the taxpayer by overstating rents, by claiming on empty properties and by creating fictitious tenancies. The book must be thrown at them—and there is little evidence that that is happening.

Prosecution of landlords is often neglected, partly because it would take council staff away from detecting new fraud—because they have to meet Government targets. The only thing that happens to these fraudsters is that the benefits stop, the pay cheques stop. They do not actually get prosecuted. I believe that the lack of prosecutions leads to a climate of acceptance.

I asked a written parliamentary question to the Home Office not so long ago and I got a depressing reply. I asked whether the Home Office looked at the correlation between the number of criminal prosecutions and housing benefit fraud. I also asked whether it looked at the level of housing benefit fraud. I also asked whether there were any joint initiatives between the Home Office and the Department of Social Security. I was told in the reply that it does not know how many offences of housing benefit fraud there have been, and no, it is not working with the Department of Social Security. That is not good enough. We must ensure that fraudsters are prosecuted.

In the debate in March, we spoke about other fraud—I will not go into the detail of what was said then, except to say that I welcome the home visits being restored. I was worried when the Government cut them, but now they have been reinstated, that will cut down on a lot of benefit fraud.

I now turn to the Child Support Agency and the way that fraud is perpetrated. It is often said that the CSA is effective in detecting benefit fraud. In April, the Chairman of the Social Security Committee, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), said in The Independent on Sunday:

"By sheer accident we have created a most efficient anti-fraud unit."

I am afraid to say that that is far from the case. The Child Support Agency presented to the Minister a report on "good cause" provisions. The report stated:

"Prior to the setting up of the CSA, the question of maintenance was dealt with as part of the consideration of a benefit claim by the local DSS office. Liable relative officers were charged with the duty to arrange maintenance payments where this was appropriate and possible."

The report went on to say:

"One apparent benefit of their work, often claimed, was the fact that questions were asked about the other parent at a very early stage prior to benefit being awarded, or just after, leading to the deterrence of collusive desertion claims (where couples fraudulently claimed to have split up), or leading to early reconciliations."

"It therefore must be of concern that any part of the claims process which apparently had been effective in deterring some fraudulent claims should not now be used."

Mr. Frank Field: The last time we debated this point, the hon. Lady was being cheered and I was being hissed by campaigners against the Child Support Agency. I accept the validity of the point that she is making. The Government could respond by suggesting that all people begin the CSA proceedings when they make their initial claim for benefits, in which case the questions that were asked in the old days about who the father is and who the husband is would be asked immediately, instead of almost a year down the line. I see the hon. Lady's point but, unlike her, I still support the CSA. The point that she made at the meeting and today is valid. Although the CSA is an agency against fraud, it is not as effective as it could be. This is a reform that we should have.

Ms Lynne: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but we will obviously disagree on the Child Support Agency. I happen to believe that it ought to be scrapped and replaced with a fair and unified family court system. It could address the problems of fraud that we have here.

Under the current system, it is easy to defraud the system. Prevention is far better than detection. The problem is that, even if fraud is detected, there is such a backlog with the Child Support Agency that it takes months and months for fraudulent claims to be investigated and for questions to be asked.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: The Social Security Committee was most impressed by—I mean that in a technical sense—the number of single parents who received maintenance application forms and then simply dropped off the benefits system. They ceased to claim because they did not want their circumstances, or the circumstances of the absent parent, to be scrutinised. That speaks volumes about the amount of fraud that the Child Support Agency has stopped.

Ms Lynne: A tremendous amount of fraud is occurring at present, and the old liable relatives unit was able to detect fraud better. Fraudulent claims cannot be dealt with because the Child Support Agency has such a backlog. Our argument with the Child Support Agency and our argument today sums up what is wrong with the benefit system generally. Too many people do not look at the facts about benefit fraud and the extent of that fraud both within the Child Support Agency and across the board.

As I said before, people are concentrating too much on detection rather than the prevention of benefit fraud. We owe it to the taxpayers and to the honest claimants to concentrate on detection. There are a tremendous number of honest claimants; they are in the majority and we must not be sidetracked from that fact. Most of those who claim housing benefit do so because they are desperately in need: they do not try to defraud the system. I believe that all hon. Members agree with that. We must tackle benefit fraud in order to save the taxpayer money and to help those who are genuinely in need.

Mr. David Porter (Waveney): This is another Opposition day, so the Opposition have another chance to pick a stick with which to beat the Government. Opposition Members seem to think that benefit fraud is an easy subject to sound tough about and that, by sounding tougher than the Government, they can steal some more Conservative party clothes. I suggest that they are wrong on both counts. Over the years, the Labour party's attitude to spending other people's money, its stress on rights ahead of responsibilities, and its often shameful record on the local government side of benefits, make its claim that it is the taxpayers' friend sound somewhat hollow.

No one has argued—and no one will—that we should not reduce fraud. As has been said, any reduction in benefit fraud has a double benefit: it stops money going to criminals, with the message that that sends in the law and order debate, and it means that more money is available to those who need the safety net of the state.

I serve on the Education and Employment Committee which, among other things, is examining the pilot schemes for the jobseeker's allowance in October. Last week, Committee members visited an Employment Service jobcentre and a Department of Social Security Benefits Agency office in Peckham, which are next door to each other. I drew from that visit the obvious conclusion that we need to merge the administration of employment-related benefits and social security benefits.

When I visit the Benefits Agency office in Lowestoft in my constituency, it seems obvious that the scope for confusion, fraud, error and sheer frustration could be reduced by linking the administration of housing benefit and council tax benefit with social security benefit. In child support cases, when there is a discrepancy between what one parent claims to earn and what the other parent says he or she earns, linking Inland Revenue information with benefit administration would surely serve as a disincentive to cheating the system. I believe that going the whole way and integrating the entire tax and benefit system would not necessarily be a bad thing. Such a move would send the right message: benefit fraud is robbery like any other form of theft.

We have laws to stop people robbing banks and each other, but those crimes are still committed. Laws cannot prevent every fraud, but we must make it as hard as we possibly can to commit fraud. With the advent of technology on a large scale and at a reasonable cost, we have a potential weapon against fraud of immense potency. I wonder whether we are harnessing it to the full.

We know already about DSS plans to link local authority and Benefits Agency computers to combat exclusively housing benefit fraud. As my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) said, multiple claimants can be spotted with any simple package of software. The use of false names, the names of the dead and post office box numbers, and the conniving of householders to help others, are harder to spot, but they are not beyond the realms of current technology.

Smartcard technology and the identification card have been offered by some as a panacea, but we should remember that stolen or forged ID cards would swiftly become valuable items for sale on the black market. We have personal numbers for national insurance, the national health service and the Inland Revenue. A single self-chosen personal identification number might help also. There has been talk about having to amend the Data Protection Act 1984 if dedicated systems freely exchange information. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to clarify in his winding-up speech whether increased use of technology will mean reform of the Data Protection Act.

Is it not incredible that we can surf the Internet and have a guided tour of the White House for the price of a local telephone call in the United Kingdom, yet my constituents cannot go into the benefits office in Lowestoft and view their Child Support Agency case on a computer screen in front of them? The Child Support Agency situation highlights the need for an integrated system to allow for fairer and more accurate assessments, which would, in turn, encourage compliance.

The need for parents who do not have continuing care—for reasons willing or unwilling—to shape the concept of child support is paramount. The need to assess income so that no one is better off on benefit than supporting his or her children is a separate but related part of the equation. The need for unemployment and training support that does not make it better to receive benefit than to stay in work is also part of the equation. What people earn in employment or through self-employment has a direct bearing on their dealings with the Child Support Agency.

If we had a better system that recognised the need of the absent parent to be in work or training as part of a long-term commitment to the children, that would go a long way towards increasing the credibility of the system. If the system had integrity, that would act as a disincentive to defrauding it willingly. There must also be a little more flexibility. For example, if parents share custody of children regularly during the week on an agreed and working basis, surely child benefit should also be shared on the same agreed and working basis.

My final point relates to the culture of fraud. We know that a downside of the welfare state is that it encourages dependency. Further reform of the welfare state in the next decade must increasingly address that problem, but another little noticed consequence is a reluctance to do anything about the problem while getting angry and blaming the Government. I shall give the House an example.

I am sure that all hon. Members have been approached by constituents who are livid because someone near them is working while claiming benefit. We might be given some details of the scam when we ask for them. I was told recently about the existence of a pool of battered, anonymous cars that are shared by a number of people who are fraudulently obtaining benefit while working a night shift at a factory and who return home in a different car every day to throw any observers off the scent.

We often press our constituents for names and for chapter and verse of fraudulent behaviour, but they are reluctant or refuse to give names and addresses—possibly because they are afraid of reprisal. I am told that the Government are to blame, but I am not given the names to report to the fraud department. In my experience, the fraud department and Benefits Agency offices do a good job often with few staff, but they cannot catch the cheats without information.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: In my experience, when we are given the necessary information, we do not receive any feedback about the results of any investigation. The result is that the fraud continues to be perpetrated, no action is taken and no reason is given, because the Benefits Agency will not discuss individual claims. There must be a more active exchange of information and much better feedback in order to encourage society to police itself and to encourage people to hand over the information so that they can see the results for themselves.

Mr. Porter: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I understand that there may be difficulties if a fraud investigation is conducted, it proves to be unfounded and a person is identified unnecessarily, but I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's comments.

Going one step further, the fraud departments link in with the police, Customs and Excise and with other agencies. I wonder whether there is a case for transferring benefit fraud investigations wholesale to the police in order to strengthen their work. We cannot change overnight the culture of dependency or the view that the benefit system is a legitimate target for theft. I suggest that we need a better run, more integrated, non-overlapping and non-wasteful administrative machine. If that is achieved, the staggering losses resulting from fraud will be cut to a minimum.

I agree with the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) that prison sentences should reflect the seriousness of crimes involving fraud. If we do all of those things, rather than inspire the same feelings as does European bureaucracy—loathing of a monster that is out of control—our system will inspire confidence in the service by, from and to the taxpayer.

6.9 pm

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I very much agree with the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter), which shows that there can be—and is—cross-party consensus on this important issue.

As a member of the Select Committee on Social Security, whose report we are debating, I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise once again some of the important issues that the Committee uncovered in its investigations into housing benefit fraud. I am also pleased to be able to challenge again the whole attitude to fraud at national and local authority level.

This debate must put to bed for good any lingering doubt that anyone has ever had that attacking benefit fraud is somehow attacking the poor. It is quite clear that such an attitude was held in certain parts of the country by certain people, but that is no longer so. It is clear, certainly to Opposition Members, and generally on both sides of the House, that the people who suffer most from benefit fraud are those in greatest need.

I want to refer to the Select Committee's recommendation on the Data Protection Act 1984. It is important to point out that the evidence that members of the Committee took questioned whether the Act was working in the interests of people who were trying to root out fraud. We took evidence from Andrew Webster of the London boroughs fraud investigators group, who said:

"I have to say that I sometimes wonder who the Data Protection Act is actually protecting, because obviously the genuine honest claimant has nothing to fear. The genuine honest person in this country has nothing to fear. The only people who hide behind the Data Protection Act are the criminals."

I am not interested in protecting the civil liberties of large landlords who are perpetrating housing benefit fraud and I hope that the recommendation on the Data Protection Act is considered seriously.

The Association of Chief Police Officers told the Committee:

"There appears to be no clear authority for police to give Local Authority investigators details of previous criminal activity or other potentially useful intelligence."

It is absolutely certain that there is a need for co-operation between agencies. Indeed, one of the Committee's recommendations says:

"the Department of Social Security and the Data Protection Registrar should review the data protection legislation, and any law and practice on which data protection legislation is based . . . to ensure that the legislation does not constitute a barrier to counter-fraud work."

Data protection is fine, but it must not be allowed to get in the way of information on fraud coming forward.

Earlier, the Secretary of State challenged the Opposition's assessment that there is £2 billion-worth of fraud, and other hon. Members have said that the figure was an exaggeration. No one can say that the figure is an exaggeration, because no one knows the real extent of fraud in the benefit system. I wonder how many people in Haringey, when asked to put a figure on the extent of benefit fraud before the investigation began there some years ago, would have come near the figure that has emerged from the small pilot study.

I certainly do not have any hidden agenda on exaggerating the amount of fraud, because I happen to represent a borough whose name was, until recently, synonymous with fraud and corruption. I am proud to represent the area that includes the London borough of Lambeth. Indeed, I am even more proud now that the borough is starting to get its act together and beginning to adopt an approach that is in the interests of its residents.

Lambeth has had a history of problems relating to allegations of fraud and corruption, especially in the late 1980s and early 1990s. During the past two years, however, the council has been committed to breaking with the past and tackling the root problems in its management and culture. That commitment was epitomised by the appointment of the new chief executive, Heather Robbatts, in April 1995. With the support of all the political parties on the council—it is, of course, a hung council—she has implemented a programme of sweeping changes in the council's management, personnel and operations. With the support of its members, she is beginning to change the whole culture of the council and its attitude to fraud.

A key part of that approach has been to improve the council's arrangements for dealing with allegations of fraud and corruption, which has involved the reorganisation of the internal agencies, responsibility for the investigation of fraud and corruption and the creation of a corporate anti-fraud team—CAFT—which reports directly to the chief executive.

The effectiveness of the new arrangements was demonstrated in the first few weeks of the establishment of CAFT by something known as Operation Jobson. In April 1995, the council and the Benefits Agency initiated the provision of a complete listing of the council's payroll data on employees for the Benefits Agency. The agency checked every employee against its computer records. No one queried civil liberties there. When the corporate anti-fraud team was set up in October 1995, 120 employees appeared to be fraudulently claiming benefit. By December 1995—only six months ago—the figure was 150.

CAFT took on responsibility for that exercise in October, and a team of hand-picked officers from the council's internal audit department were seconded to investigate and facilitate disciplinary action. That action has continued. Interestingly enough, 59 of the employees identified instantly disappeared from the council's employ—if they ever existed. The lessons learned from the exercise were that effective action required the detailed co-ordination of investigation and management action, and that CAFT, the chief executive and the head of personnel should establish a team that had power to intervene and co-ordinate work across all the council's departments.

There is no doubt that, in some local authorities, for different reasons in different departments, there is a culture of not really wanting to get to the bottom of what is happening. It was crucial to the setting up of the Lambeth team that it reported to the chief executive, was given high status and was seen as permeating the entire council and having everyone's commitment.

An anti-fraud policy statement was drawn up and circulated to every member of the council. The matter was taken very seriously. The matter may seem trivial to some people who think that people would not do anything other than be against fraud. The reality is that because of our attitude towards fraud, some people did not feel that it was their responsibility or had anything to do with them. They perhaps felt that attacking fraud was picking on the poor. Such an attitude had to be changed; a corporate attitude had to be taken.

The council is promoting whistleblowers. Wanting to shop one's mate if he or she is involved in a fraudulent act is no longer seen as something of which to be ashamed. At the end of the day, such people are working against the interests of those whom they have been employed to represent and support.

CAFT's duties are to consider not only benefit claimant fraud but contract fraud and educational awards fraud. The latter is another big type of fraud which certainly occurs in inner-city areas. Education grants are sometimes awarded when people do not attend college or use false names. Sometimes, the college for which people have been given grants in my borough has not existed. Employees claiming benefit is also a big type of fraud in local authorities. Other types of fraud include housing improvement grants fraud, private use of council resources, selling of council house keys—unauthorised tenancies—theft and misappropriation of council funds and equipment, and investigation of anonymous allegations.

CAFT brings all those types of fraud together. Fraud does not mean simply benefit fraud. All sorts of other public frauds are taking place and need to be taken on board as part of a partnership approach, which includes building an anti-fraud culture in the council, implementing a programme of fraud awareness seminars and maintaining close liaison with local police and the Benefits Agency.

I welcome what my local authority is doing. In a couple of months' time, when the team is complete, it will be leading the battle against fraud in the country. That is a terrific achievement for a borough that has had such a history. It is crucial that boroughs that accept the faults of the past and start to put them right should not be slated in the newspapers. Newspapers, and those who want to investigate fraud and mismanagement, should start looking at the boroughs.

I am not suggesting to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) that there is huge fraud in Colchester, but the fact that the borough has not even started to consider the matter makes me question whether it has any real determination to discover whether there is a problem. There is not a single borough in Britain that is not deeply involved in some kind of fraud. It is crucial that those boroughs that do the good work, and those chief executives and council leaders who take the initiative, are given credit for it and not slated by the media.

One matter which I keep raising but on which I do not seem to make much progress concerns child benefit fraud, which the Social Security Select Committee may shortly consider. I have a letter detailing someone's experience in trying to report a possible child benefit fraud to the DSS. It states:

"After obtaining the number of my local DSS office . . . from directory inquiries I initially rang seven times when the line was engaged. On the eighth occasion I got through and was transferred to the Child Benefit Section which was also engaged for three calls. At 11.30 am (an hour after starting the calls) I was successful in speaking to someone, who then just gave me another telephone number to call in Newcastle upon Tyne. This number was also engaged until 12.50 pm, then no answer at all until 1.05 pm, and then engaged again until 14.00 pm. I finally tried Directory Inquiries again who gave me a freephone number . . . which was engaged on five attempts.

Just after 14.30 pm I was successful in getting through and explained the nature of my complaints against my neighbours, who have claimed Child Benefit for two years whilst renting out their flat in London and living and working" abroad. The letter continues:

"I gave the name, address, reference number etc. of the errant claimants and was told that they would be written to, but my name and address were declined. I went on to explain that I did not feel that a letter was a practical way of dealing with the matter, and offered the mother's address in London which was also refused.

My overriding impression of the whole experience is that my time was completely wasted. I am very surprised that it proved so difficult to report a benefit fraud, and fail to see why the DSS staff in London could not take the details and why I had to pay for all the calls."

The Minister, to whom I have written on the issue of child benefit, responded to me at the end of March. He said:

"I appreciate your concern that a family might continue to receive Child Benefit by Automated Credit Transfer . . . after they have gone abroad. ACT is currently the cheapest and most secure method of payment.

Child benefit is paid to over seven million families in Great Britain, and in the vast majority of cases there are no changes of circumstances which affect benefit entitlement until a child approaches school leaving age."

Earlier, I had asked for information about Operation Rattle, set up by the DSS to investigate child benefit—the title is rather good, given what it was investigating—so the Minister went on to say:

"I should like to explain a little more about 'Operation Rattle', which was launched in November last year. This followed on from a pilot which showed that there was a loss of funds to the Department when people from abroad who were being paid Child Benefit by ACT returned to their home country and failed to notify the Child Benefit Centre.

The Operation involves close working between Benefits Agency"— and so on. He continued:

"To date, overpayments amounting to £3 million have been identified."

I do not know how big the pilot was, where it took place or how such decisions were reached. The Minister went on to say:

"Payment is stopped immediately when a nil entitlement situation is discovered."

He then quoted some horrendous figures about the money that had already been saved as a result of the pilot, which amounted to about £8 million, even in that short time with such a small number of people.

Every year, recipients of child benefit paid by automated credit transfer receive a form asking whether there are any changes in their circumstances; if there are not, nothing needs to be said or done, so the child benefit continues to be paid into the bank account. One can have a baby in this country, register for child benefit, go off to live wherever and continue to receive the money.

People may say that that involves only a few people, but we do not know. I do not believe it is only a few people. I think that large numbers of people are abusing the child benefit system. They receive child benefit from an early age having had their baby here. They may be travelling business people. The irony is that it is not poor people who are doing this but well organised, quite rich people who are using London as a business place. They go into and out of the country, keep an address here, have a bank account and receive the child benefit.

What happens when the children reach the age of 16? Presumably, because child benefit is a means of obtaining a national insurance number, they can continue to claim benefit for the rest of their lives while living in Spain. It is astonishing that this matter has not been investigated more. Such matters must be investigated and fraud made much more difficult. No one ever checks whether a child exists or what school he or she attends. There are no means of making such checks. It is a big area of neglect which should be considered seriously. I hope that the Minister will respond to some of the points I have made.

Having got all that off my chest—I feel strongly about it—I welcome some of the Government's responses to the Select Committee's recommendations. I should like to see them all being put into immediate effect, because anything that the Select Committee has done in the past has come to be seen as received wisdom a few years later.

The Select Committee's work in this area is highly commendable and I hope that the Government will implement its recommendations as quickly as possible. The key message that we must get across is that fraud, whether small, medium or large, is not acceptable. It is an insult to the poor. It affects the poor more than anyone else and the House must be united in its determination to stamp it out.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): I declare an interest: I act as a consultant to HACAS, the social housing agency. I have also written a book in the past on the subject of housing benefit, although it is now out of print and even if I had received any royalties in the past, which I did not, I certainly would not be getting any now.

This has been an interesting debate on an extremely important issue. We have heard a number of valuable contributions. I think particularly of contributions from members of the Select Committee, including my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the Chairman of the Select Committee, and my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey), who has spoken most recently. They both made eloquent and telling contributions to our debate.

We have heard contributions from Conservative Members, revealing their interest and concern in a number of extremely important issues relating to social security and fraud, but in some cases revealing a certain touch of difficulty, if not ingenuity, in trying to reconcile their support for the Committee's recommendations with their opposition to the Opposition motion which seeks to give effect to a number of the Select Committee's important recommendations.

I also apologise to those hon. Members whose speeches I did not hear in full tonight. Unfortunately, tonight's debate has coincided with the sitting of a Standing Committee of which I am a member, and I was required to attend on three occasions, on all of which, I am pleased to say, the Government were defeated.

Housing benefit fraud is big business. It is also unique for, unlike almost any other big business in late 20th-century Britain, housing benefit and housing benefit fraud are immune to downsizing. While British industry and the British people coped with downsizing and recession—many losing their jobs in the process—housing benefit and housing benefit fraud have been oases of unparalleled growth. Indeed, if our gross domestic product were measured in terms of housing benefit expenditure and housing benefit fraud, we would unquestionably be one of the most successful countries in the world.

The scale of the increase in housing benefit expenditure has been phenomenal. It has almost doubled in real terms during the past six years—from £5.5 billion in 1989-90 to £10.8 billion in 1995-96. That has not happened by accident; on the contrary, it has been the direct result of Government policy. There has been an increase in the number of people claiming housing benefit—there were about 600,000 additional claims during that period—which reflects an increase in the number of people who are unemployed and the increase in poverty in the early 1990s recession. But the real reason for the huge increase in housing benefit expenditure, as the Select Committee's report so rightly highlighted, has been the exponential rise in rents as a direct consequence of Government policy.

Between 1988-89 and 1994-95, council rents rose on average from £19 a week to £35.80 a week; housing association rents rose from £23 a week to £43 a week; and private sector rents rose from £29 a week to £69 a week. Those huge increases directly reflected Government decisions to cut subsidies to local authority and housing association homes and to deregulate the private market. Ministers knew full well what the consequences would be. When pressed—we did press them—they repeatedly told us not to worry about rising rents because, in that felicitous phrase,

"housing benefit will take the strain".

What a strain it has been. The average weekly payment of housing benefit rose by 100 per cent. between 1989 and 1994.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Gentleman claims that deregulation was such a bad thing. Is he saying that he would go back to what we had before—the regulated private sector?

Mr. Raynsford: If the Minister will bear with me for a moment, he will hear the full argument about the extent to which deregulation has not just led to a huge increase in expenditure but opened the door to a level of fraud that is a disgrace and that, instead of being used to help people in need, is lining the pockets of people who should not be receiving it. [Interruption.] Later in the debate—if the Secretary of State will contain himself—I shall explain some of the measures that Labour will take to ensure proper safeguards against abuse, and at that point the Minister will be well aware of what action a Labour Government will introduce to deal with the problems. We would not tolerate the extraordinary exponential growth in expenditure, which has been to little public benefit, over which his Government have presided.

In the deregulated private sector, average weekly payments rose from £21.06 in 1989 to £47.28 in 1994—a staggering increase of 125 per cent. The combination of that rapid expenditure growth and a deregulated environment provided an ideal framework in which fraud could thrive. Deregulation not only allowed huge increases in the amount of rent that could be charged but removed the previous safeguard that allowed local authorities to require a fair rent to be fixed by a rent officer. To add insult to injury, a significant extension of direct payments to landlords—rather than payments being channelled through claimants—offered even more enticing opportunities for fraudsters to cash in on the bonanza.

I ask the Minister to think about these figures. At the current average level of private rents, a landlord will receive for each tenant £2,458 per annum. The landlords investigated by the London borough of Haringey—those with more than 20 claims—were receiving on average more than £49,000 per year minimum. These are the cases that the Secretary of State does not believe it is reasonable to investigate. He believes that it will be too burdensome on landlords to require them to be subjected to certain checks to see whether public money is going in the right direction. That is the legacy of the Conservative Government.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and his party are committed to the fight against fraud, but will he demonstrate that commitment by referring to paragraph 59 of the Select Committee's report, which he welcomes in the motion? The paragraph refers to the harassment and the attempts to discredit Mr. Bernard Crofton. Will the hon. Gentleman join me in condeming the Labour councillors who are responsible for that authority, and condemn what they attempted to do to Mr. Crofton? Will he undertake on behalf of his party to do something about their appalling behaviour?

Mr. Raynsford: I am second to none in demanding tough action against fraud and in my support of local authority officers who take effective action against fraud, wherever they are. I have played a considerable role in recent weeks in trying to ensure that the London borough of Haringey responds positively and appropriately to the difficult challenges it faces. I hope that, in exchange, the hon. Gentleman will take a similar view of the behaviour of a member of his party who featured in an article in the South London Press, on Friday 22 March, which said:

"A sobbing former Tory chief has been jailed for 18 months for mortgage and benefit fraud."

I suggest that the hon. Gentleman divert his attention to the failures of members of his own party.

The huge escalation over the years in housing benefit expenditure provided both the opportunity and the cover for a literal explosion in the number and scale of fraudulent claims. Rather than seeing the huge increase in public spending as a problem—which they would undoubtedly have done in any other part of public policy—the Tory Government, perversely, saw it as evidence of success. They claim that it achieved a magical recovery in the private rented sector and that therefore it is justified.

The harsh truth, however, is that the "magical recovery" has been far less dramatic than Tory Ministers would have us believe. Although the explosion in expenditure has been disproportionate, the number of new private lettings has not been. Despite all the assistance offered—not just through housing benefit but the equally lavish spending on the business expansion scheme and by abnormally favourable market conditions because of the depressed home ownership market—the total number of private lettings in England has recovered to a little over 2 million, which is almost exactly the figure the Tories inherited from Labour in 1979. Furthermore, with the ending of the BES subsidy and with long-overdue evidence of recovery in the home ownership market, most commentators expect that the revival in private renting, which was achieved at such huge cost, will not be sustained.

Let me make one thing absolutely clear: Labour wants to see a healthy private rented sector, but it must be economically viable in its own right and be dependent on huge transfers of money through the housing benefit scheme. Reducing dependence on housing benefit makes sense in social and in economic terms. In case Ministers look doubtful, let me quote from their White Paper on housing, published a year ago, entitled "Our Future Homes". It stated quite correctly that

"providing a subsidy to a local authority or housing association to enable them to charge a below market rent can be cheaper over time than paying housing benefit on a market rent for several decades".

In the meantime, we must take tough action to tackle the scandalous and expensive abuse of the housing benefit system that has been allowed in recent years as a result of Government action and Government inaction. Both have been prompted by the Government's ideological obsession with deregulation. Even today, that obsession is still rearing its head, being used as a justification for not taking action to tackle landlord fraud more effectively.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) rightly pointed out that the Government's response to the Select Committee's report was deplorably vacuous and lukewarm in respect of two specific recommendations for tackling landlord abuse more effectively. The Secretary of State is well aware of the evidence, quoted in the Select Committee's report, of extensive fraud perpetrated by landlords who receive a significant number of housing benefit payments in the London borough of Haringey. The study showed that the incidence of fraud among the claims investigated was more than 20 per cent., yet the Government consider it sufficient to undertake an assessment of fraud risk rather than act decisively to clamp down on such abuse.

The final irony—I urge the Secretary of State to listen; he might even enjoy the next passage—is that the landlords who have been the beneficiaries of this extraordinary largesse from the Government over the past few years are not generous with what they have received. They have not produced many new homes, as we have pointed out, and many of the homes that they have produced have been in poor condition. There are still a disproportionate number of squalid and dangerous properties in the private rented sector. To add insult to injury, the beneficiaries of all that public money resent the suggestion that action should be taken to clamp down on benefit fraud.

Mr. Geoffrey Cutting, representing the Small Landlords Association, is quoted in the 17 May edition of Inside Housing magazine—I invite Ministers to listen carefully—as saying:

"the defrauding of landlords by the state far exceeds the defrauding of the state by landlords . . . When the state defrauds landlords they can expect landlords to respond by defrauding the state".

I should be interested to hear the Secretary of State's response to that thinly veiled incitement to malpractice. Will we hear an unequivocal, unreserved condemnation of that disgraceful statement?

Mr. Lilley: Yes. For the hon. Gentleman's benefit, I unequivocally condemn such a remark. I was only sorry that he did not join the Select Committee in unequivocally condemning attempts to stop the housing officer in Hackney doing his job.

Mr. Raynsford: I remind the Secretary of State that I made it clear, in my response to an earlier intervention, that I thought it absolutely right for local government officers to be able to continue to pursue the fight against fraud in an effective and proper way. I have no doubt that that should be the case regardless of the London borough, or other local authority, in which those officers work. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I remind the House, and Government Front Benchers in particular, that I deplore seated interventions, especially when they are repeated.

Mr. Raynsford: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Much can and should be done, as a matter of urgency, to call a halt to the abuse of housing benefit and to ensure tough action against the fraudsters. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury mentioned a number of our policy proposals. He spoke of the need to tighten the rules on direct payment of benefit to landlords, and to insist on proof of the landlord's ownership—or the managing agent's control of the property—and disclosure of other addresses to which housing benefit is paid. All those measures will help to stamp out bogus claims from "paper tenancies".

My hon. Friend spoke of the need for checks on redirected mail, which allow benefit to go on being paid long after entitlement has ceased, and the introduction of a self-financing national licensing scheme for multi-occupied houses. Such a scheme would have many benefits apart from stopping fraud: it would help to improve poor conditions, and would save many tenants from risks that are often life-threatening. My hon. Friend also mentioned the importance of targeted investigation and the use of more specialist fraud-busting teams, able to operate—like many of the fraudsters—across local authority boundaries. Labour believes that every area in the country should be covered: there should be no hiding place or soft-touch area for organised fraudsters.

My hon. Friend spoke of achieving better co-ordination between the various agencies involved, including local authorities, the Department of Social Security and the rent officer service. The latter can play a crucial role, as it has a duty to assess whether rents are reasonable for housing benefit subsidy, and considerable knowledge about appropriate rent levels. Astonishingly, the Government appear to be largely unaware of the scope for anti-fraud activity by rent officers. Similarly, co-ordination between local authorities and the Inland Revenue will help to identify landlords who are defrauding the housing benefit system, the Inland Revenue or both.

Ms Lynne: While the hon. Gentleman is referring to the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), can he confirm that current Labour party policy is not to reverse the habitual residence test?

Mr. Raynsford: No, I cannot. The hon. Lady will appreciate that I have approximately one minute left. Moreover, the question should have been addressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, the social security spokesman, rather than to me as housing spokesman.

We believe that all those measures are important and necessary, and should be introduced as a matter of urgency. Under a Labour Government, they will be. We will support the sensible recommendations of the Select Committee, as well as other measures that we have ourselves proposed, some of which I have outlined.

The contrast between our commitment to effective action and the Tories' shameful record could not be more revealing. They created an environment in which fraud could thrive; they ignored the warnings about potential abuse of the system, and complacently interpreted the escalation in housing benefit expenditure as evidence of success; and they have been remiss in tackling organised fraud for fear of upsetting landlords, many of whom have been actively engaged in defrauding the social security system on a vast scale. Even now, they remain lukewarm in their commitment to effective action. Their proposal to put housing benefit out to competitive tendering is sending precisely the wrong message.

There could be no clearer sign of the fundamental difference between the parties on the issues that really count. Labour is determined that there should be a social security system that delivers benefits to people in need, not a social security system that is open to fraud on the scale that we have seen.

6.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Oliver Heald): We have had a good debate, featuring distinguished contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) and for Waveney (Mr. Porter) and some interesting comments from Opposition Members—although, in many instances, they may not have been quite as distinguished.

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North-West Durham): How graceless.

Mr. Heald: It may seem graceless, but it is accurate none the less. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) sits chortling, but let me begin by quoting from the Select Committee's report on housing benefit. Mr. Bernard Crofton of Hackney council is described as "an inspiration to those working seriously to tackle fraud."

The Committee goes on to deplore the way in which Hackney councillors have treated Mr. Crofton—the way in which they have tried to discredit him—and refers to "selective leaking" of the council's procedures.

Opposition Members are relying heavily on the Select Committee report tonight. I invite the hon. Member for Greenwich to condemn the councillors who are hounding Mr. Crofton—someone whom the Committee has described as "an inspiration to those working seriously to tackle fraud."

I now give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to say those words.

Mr. Raynsford: As the Minister was clearly incapable of listening to what I said, let me repeat it a third time. I give way to no one in my determination to ensure that local government officers, whatever the authority in which they work—Hackney, or any other authority—should be able to pursue their work in rooting out fraud in the most effective way. I expect councillors to give full support to an authority that acts to deal with fraud. As I said earlier in response to an intervention from the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), I have been actively involved in recent months in helping to ensure that the London borough of Hackney does precisely that in the months ahead.

Mr. Heald: Well, the words did not come forth.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: Should it not be pointed out that the councillors responsible for the conduct of that policy against Mr. Crofton are still full members of the Labour party, and that no action is being taken against them? Does that not speak volumes about what the Labour party still remains—an evil in this land?

Mr. Heald: It is a litmus test, and one that the Labour party has failed tonight. The hon. Member for Greenwich holds up a press cutting about a Conservative who has been disgraced for fraud. I condemn that man; but the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to condemn councillors who are hounding a man who is an inspiration to those working against benefit fraud.

It is all part of a picture. We heard about Lambeth from the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey). Lambeth is now improving its position, after so many years of scandalous neglect when it would never have considered taking fraud seriously. The hon. Lady said that Lambeth—a Labour council—did not want to know when it came to allegations of fraud.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is a Front-Bench spokesman and had so much to say in criticising Conservative Members who, over many years, have tried to stamp out fraud. When he was chairman of Islington housing committee, what did he ever do to clamp down on benefit fraud? Nothing. It is all very well to produce sneering comments about small landlords and to attack what the Government are doing, but tonight I should like to stand up and be counted.

The Conservative Government have revolutionalised—[Interruption.] They have revolution—[Interruption.]—whatever the word is. They have radically improved our measures against benefit fraud, which is largely down to the efforts in recent years of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who introduced tough incentives to force local authorities kicking and screaming into the 21st or the 20th century, so that they would investigate benefit fraud effectively.

Ms Armstrong: Classic.

Mr. Heald: It is.

In 1993-94, weekly benefit savings for local authorities amounted to £92 million; now they amount to more than £200 million. They have almost trebled as a result of our measures.

Some hon. Members said that we did not know how much benefit fraud there was. It is true that, for years, we did not. The figures on fraud that had been detected used to go up year by year and we did not know how much fraud there was, but the benefit reviews, which use the best methodology that could be devised and which are approved by the National Audit Office, have shown us the scale of benefit fraud. It is about 10 per cent. in unemployment benefit, income support and housing benefit. It is shocking, but it has been carefully researched and studied and we know the extent of it.

Having found the extent of fraud, in the second year of his period of tenure, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State took action. He announced a programme that will, over five years, reduce benefit fraud by 70 per cent. Last August, we launched the barcode scanner, which, since its introduction, has saved more than £200 million in relation to the face value of order books.

We introduced, in September 1995, the pilot freephone hotline; in October 1995, the Post Office reward scheme, which has saved £12 million since it was implemented; in November 1995, Europe's largest data-matching computer system of its type, the new NINO—national insurance number—procedures and tougher verification; and, earlier this year, cross-matching with stolen birth certificates to ensure that we have a better system for national insurance numbers.

On 5 March, the date of the previous debate on these issues, my right hon. Friend announced the spotlight on benefit cheats area campaigns. I have been to 15 areas. Yesterday, I launched the campaign in Cardiff and today I launched it in Plymouth.

Mr. Chris Smith: With Labour authorities.

Mr. Heald: Labour authorities are no doubt co-operating.

I have met benefit investigators working for the Benefits Agency, who are experts in their sector. Every area that I visited last year has achieved record weekly benefit savings, and they are committed to doing even better this year. It is wrong for the Labour Front-Bench spokesman to criticise investigators and to pretend that they could not even—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman criticised investigators' professionalism. He said that they could not arrange even a route of visits from one door to the next, in order to do their work, but they do that. What is more, they do data-matching.

Mr. Smith: Let me put the Minister right on one simple point. I am criticising not Benefits Agency staff, but the Government for the way in which they have organised things.

Mr. Heald: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for changing his position, but the fact is that he criticised the benefit investigators, who have not only trained local authority officials, but provided them with a manual that sets out the procedures that they should adopt. They are working closely together, with agreements that have been hammered out and that work effectively. For the hon. Gentleman to criticise Benefits Agency staff in that way is wrong and deplorable.

Mr. Frank Field rose—

Mr. Heald: I do not have time. I have six minutes left and a bit more to say.

What has Labour's contribution been to tackling benefit fraud? Its local authorities have had to be dragged into attacking housing benefit fraud. Its Front-Bench spokesmen have been here claiming that there has been £1 billion more housing benefit fraud than we say, but Labour's council leaders tell me that our targets for them are too high and that they cannot—

Ms Armstrong: They are not.

Mr. Heald: The hon. Lady says that they are not. I went to the meeting with the local authority associations on 18 March, when they told me exactly that. My right hon. Friend has been creating a raft of measures against benefit fraud which, rightly, have been praised by the Select Committee, but where was the Labour party? It was not suggesting ideas, that is for sure—it was just complaining. There has never been a constructive contribution.

Mr. Raynsford rose—

Mr. Heald: I do not have time.

Now that the scale of fraud is known and the strategy is in place and working, Labour is trying to jump on the bandwagon and to use a crude overestimation of fraud to sound tough and to explain away its expensive spending plans. It is inventing fraud and announcing half-baked measures to detect it.

Mr. Raynsford rose—

Mr. Heald: I am not giving way. I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman.

Labour claims that it would detect an extra £310 million-worth of landlord fraud, but it has not done its homework, as it totals only £150 million. Why did it get it wrong? It wanted to. It does not know anything about fraud detection and it has never had an interest in it. It says that its home visits would save an extra £520 million. It talks about 4 million visits at £3 a go, allowing only eight minutes for each visit. I have asked benefit investigators how they would get on if they had eight minutes between investigations and how they could fit in the 77 minutes that they normally take to interview someone thoroughly to check his documents, to consider his position and perhaps to advise him about what benefits were available to him. One of them told me: "I would need a rocket tied on my back." Another said: "I couldn't do a proper job."

That is just Labour all over. It has not done its homework. Why has it got it wrong? It wanted to and it does not understand fraud detection.

Labour talks about stricter procedures on national insurance numbers, ignoring the fact that such procedures are being put in place. In November 1995, we tightened the registration procedures. In February, the new database for stolen birth certificates was introduced. In October, the new P46 procedure to check new workers' claims against national insurance numbers will be introduced.

My right hon. Friend has revolutionised the battle against benefit fraud, but Labour authorities have had to be dragged into helping. Labour spokesmen have had no ideas—just complaints—and now they are trying, belatedly, to jump on the bandwagon, but without doing their homework.

Ms Armstrong: The Minister has read this before.

Mr. Heald: No, I have not. Labour has had no new ideas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North raised a number of important questions about the way in which national insurance number surveys should be conducted in future. Apart from the measures that I mentioned, we should have the detailed strategy for national insurance numbers that we have for benefit fraud generally and housing benefit—which the Government will be announcing. We should also improve the approach to fraud through the spotlight process. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight referred to the programme in his constituency, where claimants have been given two weeks to get their benefit claims in order. We are about to start active operations and take focused measures.

Every time we launch a new spotlight campaign, we learn something—which is the way in which the Government should approach benefit fraud. Apart from the strategy and measures that we have in place, we must constantly investigate and make improvements. We do not need any lessons from the Labour party, which has done nothing over the years. Opposition Members speak as if they have spent 17 years giving us fantastic new ideas for cracking benefit fraud. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Simon Burns and
Dr. Liam Fox.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the priority given by Her Majesty's Government to tackling all aspects of benefit fraud; endorses the Government's successful work in detecting and preventing fraud, which has resulted in the benefit savings target of £1.3 billion being exceeded in 1995–96; congratulates the Government on carrying out the first systematic review of the amount and type of Housing Benefit fraud; notes that Housing Benefit administration is the responsibility of local authorities and that local authorities only started tackling fraud seriously once the Government introduced financial incentives for them to do so; welcomes the new fraud strategy which will result in savings of £2.5 billion a year by 1999; deplores the Labour Party's attempt to exaggerate the amount of fraud as a pretext to spend more money; and condemns the Labour Party's continuing half-heartedness in tackling benefit fraud and abuse.

Nuclear Industry (Privatisation)

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I have to tell the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.15 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move,

That this House notes that the publication of the Pathfinder prospectus for the sale of British Energy confirms the suspicions of Her Majesty's Opposition that the sale is a bad deal for the taxpayer; further notes that the proceeds are anticipated to be less than the cost of building Sizewell B whilst the other seven reactors are being given away free, that boardroom pay will rise by 40 per cent. whilst one in 20 employees have lost their jobs in the last year, that it has yet to be demonstrated that the sale proceeds will cover the shortfall in the Magnox liabilities, that the bulk of the initial Segregated Fund to pay for British Energy's clean up costs comes in the form of a 'dowry' from the balance sheets of the pre-privatisation publicly-owned companies and that the Government has not sufficiently settled issues relating to the ability of a privatised nuclear industry to compete in the electricity generating industry on an equal footing with other private generators; and condemns the privatisation as a reckless and cynical attempt to raise short term cash at the expense of the long term interests of taxpayers.

The context of this debate, like the one that preceded it, is value for public money and an assessment of where the overall public interest lies.

Only a few weeks ago—following a Select Committee report on privatisation of nuclear power stations, and in the absence of any sign that the Government intended to have a debate on the issues raised by that report—Opposition Members took the opportunity of Opposition time, as we do today, to focus on some issues of public policy over which, as is all too evident, the Government would much prefer to draw a veil.

On that previous occasion, we said that this was an extraordinary privatisation, and that it was extraordinarily difficult to justify. That view is not only maintained but enhanced by the lack of answers to the questions raised then, and by the new information that has since emerged, despite the Government's best efforts to conceal it.

In one respect, this privatisation may be unique. Concerns about whether the taxpayer is getting a good deal have often been raised, but with this sale there are also questions about whether the shareholder is getting the full picture. I accept at once that, at first glance, it seems unlikely—it certainly could be argued that it would be difficult—for anyone to construct a deal that is disadvantageous, first, to the taxpayer and, later, to the shareholder. But I suspect that, if anyone can do it, this Government can.

Before the previous debate, the Government said that a response to the concerns raised by the Select Committee would be available, and would be debated within "the normal time scale". However, as we suspected, it seems that the Government did not intend such a debate to precede the sale.

The Minister's basic case in that debate was that all the questions raised either had been dealt with already or would be dealt with in the prospectus, which we now have available. I shall remind the House of some of those questions.

There is first the issue whether liabilities will follow assets into the private sector—an assertion that the Minister of State has made repeatedly—without it ever being made wholly clear whether that really means all rather than part of those liabilities. It is on that basis that, despite the money that taxpayers have to cough up at the front end of the sale, the Minister claims that this sale is to the taxpayer's long-term benefit. Not only many Opposition Members but many analysts argue that there is considerable risk attached to that aspect of the Government's case.

Revenues to meet those liabilities in the long term are intended, at least in part, to be available from the segregated fund. It is now much clearer—even clearer than it was in our previous debate—that, to offset liabilities assessed on an undiscounted basis at £14 billion, it is anticipated that revenue secured for investment in and by the segregated fund will cover only a sum of the order of £4 billion. It seems to be anticipated that the rest of the liabilities will be covered from the operating revenues earned by the company.

So key to the Government's basic case is the assumption about the company's financial performance in the private sector. In fact, the more we study that case, the more it appears that some of those key questions remain unanswered, and that such answers as do exist might give potential shareholders pause for thought.

To begin with, there is obscurity about the issue of the segregated fund itself. The last Red Book shows a cost to the Exchequer in respect of the industry of some £230 million—precisely the sum that has appeared on the balance sheet of British Energy, and will be the dowry it provides to start off the fund.

It is presumably on the basis of the scale of the dowry from public funds that the level of yearly contribution from the privatised company is assessed at a mere £16 million a year, as compared to previous estimates from City analysts that funding would have to be about £30 million to £50 million a year—more than double, at the very least. I say "presumably", because the Government have, up to now, failed to publish or place in the Library of the House the report that they claim provides the justification for such a low contribution, on the spurious grounds that it is not yet completed. However, that does not seem to have prevented the Government from reaching a judgment on the report.

The potential of the revenue stream for the company and what that means for shareholder returns is also key to the value of the sale. Here too, considerable questions remain unanswered. For a start, in our previous debate it was pointed out that the assumptions that underlay the value placed on the company were heavily influenced by the load factor at which it was argued that the stations to be privatised could be run. It was pointed out in that debate that a load factor of 82.5 per cent. had been assumed—a level which, it was argued, had never been attained, and which few analysts believed could ever be attained.

To put the matter in perspective, we can see in the prospectus a method of presentation of the performance of the advanced gas-cooled reactors which gives a figure for best ever performance of 74 per cent. in 1995. In the year to 31 March 1996, those reactors achieved a performance of just 71 per cent. Despite the fact that that assumption must be crucial to assessing either the value of the sale or the assumptions of future revenues and hence future dividends, the Government are saying little or nothing about how they now view those assumptions. I hope that the Secretary of State will remedy that omission today.

This is particularly relevant because, in the past couple of days, we have learnt of the existence of a legal review of the sale carried out by Clifford Chance, which is said to have been made available to the company and the Government. I hope that the Secretary of State will comment on the matters it raises in this debate, and either publish the legal review or place it in the Library.

I ask that because a document that I have seen, which purports to be a draft of the report, draws attention to two issues that have substantial implications for the commercial aspects of the sale. Discussing design and technical issues, it says:

"Several on-going and major generic technical problems either affecting, or potentially affecting the stations" to be privatised are identified. It is said that, in the case of carbon deposition, that may affect output. It is said that the problems may have "high commercial penalties".

The review raises issues of staffing levels, and the need to have sufficient qualified and experienced staff. It highlights doubts about whether that can all be provided, especially if there is to be substantial contracting out of work. Again, the quality of the human capital of the company is said in the report to raise issues with considerable commercial consequences. That is probably because of the assessment that some 60 per cent. of incidents causing loss of output are thought to be due to human error.

Those issues are relevant not just to the value of the company but to the revenue stream that can be anticipated. Yet, from the prospectus, it is obvious that that revenue stream is key to the statement that liabilities will follow the assets and will be covered in the private sector.

Let me remind the House that it is now evident that it is anticipated that some £10 billion of the undiscounted liabilities will be expected to be covered by the company's revenues, so questions about the security of the revenues go to the heart of the coverage of liabilities.

The prospectus raises another question about the degree to which liabilities are following assets. On page 73, the prospectus refers to liabilities falling due after the closure of the existing stations and outside the scope of the segregated fund, so not covered directly by the company's revenues. It says that they will have to be covered by further investments to provide funding to meet the payments as required.

I should be grateful if the Secretary of State could shed some light on what that means. Does it mean that a further segregated fund would be set up, and, if so, does that not suggest that the present fund is inadequate to bridge the gap between liabilities and the income to cover them? Does it simply mean that, apart from the revenue stream having to meet the cost of liabilities which fall while the station is operating, it is also expected that revenues will have to cover sums set aside to provide a further long-term income stream when the stations have ceased to operate? What interests us in the context of the sale is the implications of that statement for the prospect of future dividends.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): The initial endowments of £157 million and £71 million or £79 million from Scottish Nuclear have been called prudent by the independent actuaries. Is the hon. Lady challenging what the independent actuaries have said?

Mrs. Beckett: If the hon. Gentleman has had sight of the report from the independent actuaries, we would like to see it as well, and so would the House. How does he know what the independent actuaries have said? It is not in the Library of the House. Can he cast any light on the matter? Is he claiming to have seen the report?

Dr. Spink: My information comes directly from British Energy.

Mrs. Beckett: I am not sure on what basis, as a Government Back Bencher, the hon. Gentleman has this inside track to British Energy. I am sure that other potential shareholders would be delighted to have the same information. He strengthened the case I was making to the Secretary of State for publishing the report. I am sure that the Secretary of State will be able to tell us that he intends to do so.

The prospectus shows that dividend payments from the privatised company may not be covered by profits after tax for a number of years. That brings me to the question of the return for shareholders.

It is hard to know what to make of the extraordinary decision to announce what first year dividend the company will pay, when the sale has not yet taken place. To announce also that the dividend will be about twice the rate of the most optimistic profits forecast for that year so far raises the question what the company is doing promising dividends on such a scale. What makes the whole thing utterly ludicrous is that the dividend is to be paid before potential investors will have had to cough up a second instalment of the price of their shares.

Harold Macmillan once said that selling off state assets was like selling the family silver. The nuclear industry looks like being almost the last item to go in the Tory car boot sale of state assets. As any hon. Member who has read the words of the prospectus carefully will acknowledge, what is on offer here may not be silver—in fact, it looks remarkably like fool's gold.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): The right hon. Lady seems to be rather pessimistic about prospects for the shares, and seems to be telling people not to buy them. Can she assure us that her investment advice will be better than that of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Mrs. Short), who told people not to buy Railtrack shares on the grounds that they would go down rather than up? Does she have any comment on that?

Mrs. Beckett: If I were a shareholder in either of those industries, I would rather have a longer period over which to judge what might happen to the share price than the right hon. Gentleman seems to be taking into account, which, as has been pointed out, is exactly what the brokers are saying. If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about the advice that we are giving, or believes that the observations that we are making about this potential sale are unsound, I suggest that he takes a further look at what is being said about it in the City.

Dr. Spink: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: No, not again. I want to get on, and I do not want the hon. Gentleman to incur another disaster, as he did on his previous intervention.

The company made a loss last year and warns of making one this year, but it still offers a massive dividend payout that seems to have been financed by a bridging loan from Her Majesty's Treasury.

The prospectus suggests that the company's ability to pay dividends at all in future is by no means certain. The directors say in the prospectus that their dividend policy is "critically dependent" on six assumptions, which I shall paraphrase for the benefit of the House.

It is assumed that the pool price of electricity will not fall substantially and that any price review will not affect British Energy's performance; that there will be no major unanticipated station failures; that British Energy will meet its targets, including both extending the life of some stations—running them longer—and making cost savings; that there will be satisfactory returns from reinvestment; that there will be no wider changes in regulation that will have an adverse impact on British Energy; and that there will be no significant rise in inflation.

Those are hefty caveats. It is evident that the assumptions are not only unlikely to be all fulfilled, but that they are mostly entirely outside the control of the directors. The notion that there is unlikely to be any change in regulation or any adverse outcome from the price review is hardly borne out by what has happened with electricity or gas supply.

The hope that there will be no unanticipated station problems is highly dependent, as the legal review to which I referred earlier shows, on some of the technical issues. The prospectus makes it clear that it is possible that unforeseen events or changes in regulatory standards may require the lifetimes of stations to be reduced, yet the background to the dividend policy talks about half of them having their lives extended.

All the assumptions are most heavily dependent on the position in the trading pool in which the price of electricity is set. At present, nuclear power stations have preferential access to that pool. The regulator has previously acknowledged that, if he were asked—for example, by other generators—to review British Energy's access to the pool, he would have to do so. That may in part account for the statement in the prospectus that the regulator has been asked "to avoid making any announcement during the offer of the sale—and for three months after commencement of dealings—other than in exceptional and unforeseen circumstances".

The prospectus also makes it clear that other regulators have been asked to avoid saying or doing things that might affect the price of British Energy shares.

The fact remains that assumptions about what will happen in the pool, and about the effect of its operation on the price of electricity, are crucial to the assumptions that are being made about the dividends that are said to be on offer to shareholders. Shareholders who read in the popular press references to the new opportunities that this sale offers to Sid should bear in mind what has happened to the original Sids, which was itself a direct result of changes in Government policy of which Sid was given no inkling when the Government sold him or her their shares in British Gas.

The sale contains wider and more profound risks than simply commercial ones. In the previous debate, we drew attention not only to the inadequacy of the insurance cover that is being required of the industry but to the fact that it was substantially less, even on the most generous estimates, than that frequently required elsewhere in the private sector—in the chemical industry, for example. That point was made to the Select Committee by the CBI.

The Minister's response in our previous debate was to talk about the narrow nature of any potential liabilities for the industry, as if a major accident—that is what the insurance is all about—would not have a significant impact, because of the restricted nature of the industry. That argument is bizarre. I call on the Government again, as does the private sector, to re-examine the provision that is being made on that. As matters stand, it is yet another area of financial uncertainty—certainly for the taxpayer, and probably even for the shareholder.

Our motion describes this privatisation as "reckless and cynical". I believe that any impartial observer would agree that that description was well-merited. I suspect that the level of hostile comment, and the degree of reservation expressed in the financial sector, is as unprecedented as the nature of this privatisation. There are certainly hidden consequences for the taxpayer. There may well be hidden consequences for the shareholders.

The only clear beneficiaries are the directors, whose total remuneration, according to the prospectus, is to rise by 38 per cent. on average; and a Government who are desperate to raise revenues that they hope can be used to justify a short-term tax cut and who are entirely indifferent to the consequences for the shareholder or the taxpayer in the longer term.

To say that the terms of the sale of the industry are unfair would be a gross understatement. The expected sale price, which is now said to be about £1.7 billion, is about half the cost of building Sizewell B alone. The other power stations have been thrown in for free. It is a tenth of the £13 billion that taxpayers have already laid out from their own pockets to build reactors.

This is not a sale. Ministers no doubt hope that potential shareholders will believe that it is a free lunch. Yet the Government tell us constantly that there is no such thing as a free lunch. Whatever the potential benefits of the sale, the potential losses seem increasingly likely to outweigh them. The Government have long ceased to act in the public interest. The sale may be one of the most blatant examples of their indifference and neglect; it is certainly one more reason why they should be driven from office.

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the publication of the Pathfinder prospectus for the sale of British Energy which confirms that the sale fulfils the Government's commitment to ensuring that liabilities follow assets into the private sector and is a good deal for the taxpayer who will benefit from equity proceeds, debt repayment and the permanent transfer to the private sector of responsibility for almost £4 billion of nuclear liabilities, for British Energy employees who will now have the opportunity to take a real stake in the future of their industry, for Magnox Electric which will be a robust public sector company capable of meeting its liabilities as they fall due; and further notes that the privatisation of British Energy serves the long term interests of the taxpayer, the industry, and consumers; and condemns the persistent attempts by the Opposition to undermine this and other privatisations.'.

Once again, the Opposition are parading their familiar themes of doom and gloom and of misconception. Time and again, we have listened to Labour Members criticise any privatisation proposals. When will they learn that such scaremongering has never proved to be correct? The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) quoted the words "reckless" and "cynical" from her motion. They are a good summary of her attempt to undermine the privatisation.

I invite the House to consider first the general picture. It is worth reminding Labour Members that, in 1979, nationalised industries were costing the taxpayer more than £50 million a week. By contrast, in the past financial year, privatised companies paid about £55 million a week into the Exchequer.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) rose—

Mr. Lang: I shall give way, although I have barely started.

Mr. Wilson: The fact that the right hon. Gentleman has barely started does not mean that he has not entered the field of inaccuracy. Will he confirm figures from the Library that show that, at least until last year, the electricity industry had never delivered so much in taxation to the Exchequer since privatisation as it used to in profits before privatisation?

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar) indicated dissent.

Mr. Wilson: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but that is one of the many facts concealed by all this bombast. The Exchequer got more from the profits of the electricity industry before privatisation than it has from taxation since.

Mr. Lang: If the hon. Gentleman wants to examine the history of electricity, I remind him that, under the last Labour Government, the price of electricity went up in cash terms by 2 per cent. every six weeks—4 per cent. a quarter, or 16 per cent. a year. I do not think that I need to trade records with the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Beckett rose—

Mr. Lang: I want to make some progress in answering the right hon. Lady's points. However, I shall give way, although it may be more difficult for me to do so later.

Mrs. Beckett: I take that warning, and assume that it means that there are a few rude remarks to come.

Thje right hon. Gentleman has used those figures before, so I have had them checked, but I have not yet been able to stand them up; I shall keep trying. Even assuming that they are accurate, he might bear in mind the fact that, in the mid-1970s, the price of oil increased by four or five times, which is not insignificant in determining the price of electricity. The Government always ignore that.

Mr. Lang: A large amount of electricity was generated by coal, nuclear power and water. The right hon. Lady cannot hide behind that argument. The Labour Government's record was appalling. I have quoted the figures that show the cost to the taxpayer of nationalised industries, and the benefit now that they have been privatised.

I had hoped that the right hon. Lady would set out more clearly her party's policies on energy and privatisation. Sadly, I was disappointed, but I should have realised, that on one of the rare occasions on which her party allows to her appear in public, the last thing she would be permitted to do would be to let us hear her views on those matters.

Does she agree with the last Labour Secretary of State for Energy, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who is, alas, not here to receive the plaudits of the House? He was the man who said:

"the Government believe that the nuclear component is necessary for the energy policy of the United Kingdom".—[Official Report, 15 May 1978; Vol. 950, c. 177.]

He commissioned Heysham 2 and Torness, and embarked on the pressurised water reactor programme that gave us Sizewell.

Or does the right hon. Lady agree with the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), who I am delighted to see in his place? He said:

"a future Labour Government will not undertake any measures to prolong the workings of those nuclear power stations already contributing to electricity generation"?

Her motion talks of short-termism, but if ever there was a glaring example of short-termism, it is that. How can she have the effrontery to talk of the long-term interests of the taxpayer? What can be more cynical and short-termist than to refuse to extend the life of perfectly useful power stations, as the Labour party's policy proposes to do?

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Lang: In a moment. I must make a little progress.

The right hon. Lady has made various cynical attempts to undermine the successful privatisation of British Energy, but she has not yet told us what her policy will be next month when the company is sold. Logic dictates that she would want to renationalise it. If so, today provides her and her party with an opportunity to explain her party's position.

The Labour party is often accused of making U-turns. It is true that Labour Members often display a remarkable flexibility of principle. We know, for example, that in government the Labour party set in train a massive programme of building nuclear power stations. In opposition it declares itself against nuclear power and seeks to undermine it with scaremongering. The one thing in which it has been consistent is in opposing every privatisation proposal that the Government have introduced. It is opposed to privatisation, because it is opposed to free enterprise. It does not like freedom, and it does not understand enterprise.

The rest of the world does understand privatisation. Privatisation is one of Britain's biggest export success stories. Germany, Spain, Italy, eastern Europe, south-east Asia, South America and Africa—all over the world, countries are following Britain's lead and embarking on privatisation in the confident expectation of benefits to the economy and to consumers. The Labour party takes its place along with Cuba and North Korea in the elite group of socialist utopias for which privatisation is still a dirty word.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): It is the privatisation, after all, of gas—controlled by the regulator—which has produced such a windfall for consumers. What estimates has my right hon. Friend made of the windfall, if you like, in terms of lower electricity bills that would result from the privatisation of Nuclear Electric? Come to that, if Nuclear Electric was not privatised, what would be the cost to each household?

Mr. Lang: Sadly, we can only speculate on the Labour party's windfall profits tax policy. The fact is that, if it has a tax-raising policy, windfall taxes seem to be part of it. Our purpose is to look at utilities as a source not of revenue for the taxpayer but of advantage in terms of reduced prices to the consumers. That is the difference between us and the Labour party.

We are now on target to complete electricity privatisation in the United Kingdom. The flotation of British Energy, one of Britain's three largest generating companies, marks the culmination of the Government's privatisation plans for the industry. This final burst of energy will extend the benefits I outlined a few moments ago. It will free the industry to make its own investment decisions. It will encourage improvements in the generators' overall economic efficiency, and enhance their competitiveness. Surely even the Labour party would not seek to deprive industry of the opportunity to serve us better.

Privatisation has helped millions to become shareholders. It has encouraged countless employees to take a stake in their future. It has given real power to the consumer by developing choice and competition. I hate to disappoint the Labour party by reporting that public interest in privatisation issues is undiminished. As of today, more than 1.3 million people, and rising, have registered for the public offer. I am confident that the Government are set for another successful sale. I trust that that puts the record straight about the benefits of privatisation and the level of public interest in our programme.

Now I should like to put the record straight about some of the other misconceptions which have been cast about. One of these—the right hon. Member for Derby, South spent some time on it this evening—is the level of proceeds we expect to receive from the sale. Of course, that is a matter for the market to decide, on the basis of the information in the prospectus. It is clear from some of the statements that Labour Members have made that they are not expert in that area. It may assist them in their understanding if I briefly explain some of the relevant factors.

When calculating the total proceeds from the sale of British Energy, it is important to take account of three components. First, there are the proceeds from selling the shares in the company. That amount will be decided by the market at the time of flotation. That will reflect the value of the assets in their current state, and the competitive market in which they operate. Prospective purchasers look into the future at profit and cash generation. They do not look into the past at the historic cost of the assets.

Secondly, there are the proceeds from the debt due from British Energy to the Government. That will be realised either by repayment or by selling the debt on to third parties. As a result of the restructuring of the industry, British Energy now owes £600 million to the Government that was not owed before the restructuring. Repayment or sale of that £600 million represents proceeds to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Is the Secretary of State aware that the total liabilities for the advanced gas-cooled reactors and the one pressurised water reactor are £14.6 billion? Can he tell us whether the total liability will follow the asset?

Mr. Lang: Yes, I can confirm that the total liability is following the asset. I shall come to that important point soon.

Let me emphasise the third of the three components that should be taken into account when calculating the proceeds from the sale of British Energy. The third one, and arguably the most important, is the liability that will now be met by the private sector, but would previously have been met by the taxpayer.

At 31 March this year, British Energy had accrued nuclear liabilities of £3.7 billion. These are calculated using a prudent discount rate of 3 per cent. real and the actual cash payments that they represent will be significantly higher, but spread out over a number of years. It is, however, important not to confuse discounted with undiscounted, as the right hon. Member for Derby, South appeared to do in her speech.

These liabilities have arisen from running the nuclear power stations, and they are predominantly associated with spent nuclear fuel that is awaiting reprocessing. Without privatisation, those liabilities would have been met by the taxpayer. Following privatisation, they will be met by the private sector British Energy.

The total proceeds for the taxpayer, therefore, include £3.7 billion for past liabilities passed to the private sector and £600 million for debt taken on by British Energy, in addition to the proceeds from the share flotation, of course.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Will the Secretary of State inform the House whether the plutonium that the Government intend to transfer to private ownership as part of the sell-off of Nuclear Electric and Scottish Nuclear will be listed as an asset or a liability?

Mr. Lang: That is a matter entirely for the company and its advisers. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman has a good look through the prospectus.

Let me develop a little more the question of liabilities. Liabilities are another area in which the Opposition—they demonstrated it again tonight—have difficulties appreciating the true position. I can only repeat yet again that liabilities have followed assets.

As long ago as last May, on publication of the nuclear review White Paper, we made it clear that we expected nuclear liabilities to follow their associated assets into the private sector. Again, when the Government gave evidence to the Trade and Industry Select Committee in November last year, we made it clear that it was a principle of privatisation that liabilities should follow their assets. In March 1996, when the nuclear industry was restructured, the principle was again followed: liabilities followed assets.

Let me say again categorically, for the record and for the avoidance of doubt, that British Energy is and will remain responsible for the liabilities associated with its stations.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): The general public find it incredible that the prospectus requires British Energy simply to set aside £16 million a year. Somehow, over 100 years, at the 3 per cent. discounted rate, that is supposed to accumulate to £14 billion. I did my arithmetic this afternoon. Compound interest of 3 per cent. over 100 years requires twentyfold growth. Does anyone believe that, at the end of the next century, Britain will be 20 times richer in terms of gross domestic product? That is the crazy accounting system that the Government have used in arriving at the figure of £16 million.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is confusing total liabilities with the decommissioning fund. There will be an initial capitalisation of some £230 million. There will also be an annual contribution of £16 million a year, which will increase in real terms, will be reviewed quinquennially and is calculated on the basis of the best possible actuarial advice, to provide a substantial and good margin for error above the actual anticipated needs. That position will continue in the longer term.

We have established an independent, segregated fund to cover all the longer-term post-closure costs of decommissioning British Energy's nuclear power stations and their sites, with the aim that all licensed nuclear sites will be cleared and returned to other uses. Obviously, it has been necessary to strike a balance between the need to reassure the public that British Energy will meet its liabilities and the need to recognise the company's commercial freedom. I believe that we have the balance right, and I would add that the scope of the fund has been agreed with the nuclear installations inspectorate.

The scope of the fund is not, however, set in stone. If, for example, British Energy changed its decommissioning strategy, the scope of the fund could also be altered to include new on-site activity not currently carried out on the site. I emphasise that any liabilities not covered by the fund remain the responsibility of British Energy. There is no question of any exemption. I say categorically that British Energy is, and will remain, responsible for the liabilities associated with its stations.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lang: I will, but then I must make progress.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the President of the Board of Trade agree that, if any of the assumptions on the basis of which this contribution to the fund is made prove unfounded—it is generally agreed that £16 million is the lowest possible figure that one can calculate, assuming every optimistic scenario—the result will be either more expensive electricity or a reduction in dividend to the shareholders?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman may jump to conclusions of that kind. Those figures have been struck on the basis of the best possible advice and which will be reviewed quinquennially. Independent trustees are responsible for those matters, and it is the best estimate that those figures will be adequate. As I have said, nothing is set in stone, and they can be reviewed as required, but we are talking about a long-term accumulation of resources.

The final misconception on which I want to put the record straight arises from the stories of a dividend sweetener of £100 million being paid by the taxpayer from a special reserve fund. The first dividend that will be received by investors is an interim dividend in respect of the year ending 31 March 1997. That dividend will be paid by British Energy, using its own cash resources, and there is no question of payment by the taxpayer from a special reserve fund.

Opposition Members have also sought to create fears that the uncovered dividend will be paid for with money needed for long-term liabilities. Again, that is totally untrue. The company is satisfied on cash flow grounds that it will be able to meet all its liabilities. Were there ever to be a question of priorities, of course, liabilities would always come first.

I shall now discuss another benefit arising from this privatisation.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North–East): Will the President give way?

Mr. Lang: No; I want to make a little more progress in this short debate.

Opposition Members may have read that the Director General of Electricity Supply announced last week that he expects to be able to announce a reduction in the fossil fuel levy following privatisation from 10 per cent. to 3.7 per cent. That reduction will have been made possible by the nuclear privatisation, because premium payments to Magnox Electric are expected to end at the time of privatisation, except as necessary to recover moneys that were originally due to Magnox but unpaid before privatisation.

The reduction in the levy rate should lead to a reduction in bills of more than 6 per cent. in a full year, or about £15 to £20 in a typical domestic consumer's bill. I look forward to hearing Opposition Members welcome that during the debate.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): Can the Secretary of State confirm that that figure is contingent on the performance of the company, and may well not be anywhere near that level, given that the prospectus says that the company does not even intend to make a profit in the first few years?

Mr. Lang: No. The position is clear, as it has been announced by the Director General of Electricity Supply, and the outstanding payments due from Magnox are held over by agreement and are being collected, so there is no uncertainty about that matter.

Mr. Miller: Will the President give way?

Mr. Lang: I want to press on and talk about the reorganisation of the nuclear industry to form British Energy and Magnox Electric, which I believe will bring wider benefits than those associated with privatisation.

Magnox Electric, which will be staying in the public sector, has been established as a robust independent player in the electricity market. It will be a substantial baseload generator, with about 7 per cent. of electricity output in Great Britain. The objectives we have set require Magnox Electric to operate in a commercial manner, judging any investments by commercial rates of return. We intend that Magnox should be a full competitor in the electricity market, and that this increased competition will be of clear benefit to consumers.

Moreover, focusing management time and expertise on one type of reactor—Magnox—will bring significant benefits in improved efficiency. The Opposition talk only about the downsides of assets and liabilities being left in the public sector, but the Magnox liabilities have always been in the public sector, and that will not change. What has changed as a result of restructuring, however, is that there is now a much clearer focus on Magnox issues, with a renewed enthusiasm at every level of the company.

Magnox Electric is a first-class generator with a proven track record in station decommissioning, and I have every expectation that the creation of an independent Magnox company and its eventual integration with British Nuclear Fuels plc will enable them to build on and further develop that expertise, and will bring significant reductions in costs from greater efficiency in the management of liabilities.

Magnox Electric is a robust public sector entity, which will enhance competition in the electricity market and aims to secure the best possible value for the taxpayer.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: The Minister said that Magnox had a proven track record on station decommissioning. I am astonished by his comment, in view of Trawsfynydd nuclear power station, which closed only a few years ago and will be there for 100 years. Where is this proven track record on station decommissioning?

Mr. Lang: The fact that it takes a long time to decommission a station does not undermine the capacity, skill and efficiency with which decommissioning is undertaken by the company. It has already made enormous progress with Berkeley, at costs substantially less than had been anticipated and provided for.

Mr. Wilson: Will the President give way?

Mr. Lang: I give way to the hon. Gentleman, as this is a matter that concerns his constituency.

Mr. Wilson: Since the possibility of a Hunterston C appears to be precluded by privatisation, it is very important for employment in my constituency to know whether there would be any inhibition to Magnox Electric building on the Hunterston A site, which it will inherit, perhaps for non-nuclear generation. Would be there be any such inhibition?

Mr. Lang: That is not a matter on which I have any decision or any position to announce tonight, when we are debating the privatisation of British Energy. That is a matter for the future. Magnox will remain in the public sector.

We have seen tonight that not only is the Labour party deeply embedded in the old attitudes of clause IV of its constitution, but Labour Members do not understand what privatisation is about.

Last week, Labour launched another of its great attacks on the Government, which was going to be the greatest assault on this privatisation exercise, called its triple whammy—and it was wrong on every point. First, Labour alleged that the Government would not ensure that Magnox had sufficient assets to cover its nuclear liabilities. That simply is not the case. Secondly, Labour said that the cost of reprocessing British Energy's spent fuel would be left with the Government. It will not. That will be met by British Energy as part of its normal commercial operations.

Thirdly, Labour said that the United Kingdom's insurance arrangements are not in accordance with international conventions on civil nuclear liability. In fact, the United Kingdom's own insurance requirement is many times higher than the minimum required under the Brussels convention, and among the highest of all the signatories to that convention. Each and all of those accusations were wrong: not only wrong but fundamentally ignorant of the basic principles of privatisation—not a triple whammy, but a triple boomerang.

Far from nuclear privatisation being a disaster, as the Opposition would try to have people believe, excellent progress is being made. All the major milestones have been reached successfully and to timetable. The next stage will be the issue of the retail prospectus next week, on 26 June.

I remain confident that the final burst of energy will be as successful as the earlier sales, for the industry, the taxpayer and the consumer. I urge the House to reject the motion and to support the Government's amendment.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I welcome the debate. We are in the middle of the nuclear flotation. We have discussed the nuclear industry three times in the past two years—at the time of the nuclear review, on the announcement of the Government's intention to privatise and, recently, following the publication of the Trade and Industry Select Committee report.

Many right hon. and hon. Members were, and are, opposed to the principle of privatisation. My all-party colleagues on the Select Committee expressed their greatest concerns about the taxpayer's interests and were worried that there would be a quick, cut-price sale. Their anxieties centred on the main issues of the valuation of the assets, the definition of the liabilities and the liabilities' subsequent valuation. A distinction must be drawn between what constitutes a liability and what that liability is valued at.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has already described the doubts that surround the valuation. It seems strange that power stations costing more than £3 billion to construct should be sold for between £1.6 billion and £2.6 billion. At the time of the initial valuation discussions, parallels were drawn with the car leaving the showroom and the change in its value at that time. Of course we all recognise that the price will fall; but when VAT, excise duty and delivery charges do not have to be taken into account, the price will fall very quickly.

Since the last debate on this subject, and since the announcement of the flotation, a report has been published on the annual segregated fund changes by Professor Sadnicki. The paper was prepared for a local authority pressure group that is opposed to nuclear power. There has never been any secret about the author's concerns about the economics of nuclear power. Nevertheless, he and Dr. Gordon McKerran of Sussex university have been influential in constructing models on which the pricing of nuclear energy has been estimated. It is no secret, either, that their work in large measure informed the Government's nuclear review, in terms of the pricing of units of nuclear energy. It could also be argued that their work was influential in persuading the Government not to proceed with the construction of any more nuclear power stations. It certainly influenced British Energy's intentions not to proceed with any nuclear power station construction in the foreseeable future.

The report cannot be lightly dismissed. I do not agree with everything in it; some of its assumptions are over the top and are not necessarily designed to impress accountants—ultimately it is their view that must be taken into account.

Perhaps the Minister will deal this evening with the point that contributions to the initial transfer of the assets may constitute a subsidy under European law. Would they contravene European legislation? It would indeed be embarrassing for the Government if the money that they used as a sweetener for privatisation were found to be contrary to European policy.

The author of the report takes as his outside limit for such contributions a sum of £208 million a year, which compares with the £16 million that the Government have been talking about. I do not think that a realistic figure. I think that £127 million is rather closer; it is achieved by assuming average economic growth of about 2 per cent. until 2026. I am not altogether confident that the Labour Government who will take office next year will stay in power that long, but the lamentable economic growth record of the past 17 years will not necessarily prove to be the model for what will follow.

Why do not the Government mention long-term items such as post-operation waste charges and post-operation payments for BNFL decommissioning? The report's author doubts whether British Energy's commercial freedom can be squared with reassurances that, where liabilities arise, they will be met. If liabilities fall where the assets are, that may restrict British Energy's ability to perform according to the market's wishes. It is pointed out in the report that any surpluses from the constituent elements of BE will be given not to the taxpayer but to Magnox for its liabilities. No one will have been convinced by the superficial gloss that the Secretary of State put on the question of the Magnox liabilities.

The report also raises the issue of post-operational reprocessing and stage 1 decommissioning of the advanced gas-cooled reactors. There is also the problem of the ability of Sizewell B to make contributions after 2025. The lifespan of Sizewell B cannot be guaranteed, so it would be imprudent to make early financial forecasts on such an optimistic view of its time in service. The point is underlined by questioning of the estimates for decommissioning and waste disposal.

We have been repeatedly told by Ministers that liabilities will follow assets, but the figures in the report suggest that the accounting procedures will not be sufficiently transparent. Throughout its history, the nuclear industry has been shrouded in secrecy. To some extent, that was inevitable because the industry's purpose in the early days was the production of nuclear weapons, but when the veil has been lifted, there have always been expressions of false optimism—about the value of certain technologies, the cost of certain projects and the predicted cheapness of units of electricity.

Those shortcomings have been seized on by the industry's detractors, and when combined with the—often wholly unsupported—assertions about safety, the technology has been dismissed out of hand.

I believe that the case for nuclear power can and should be made. However, I have never made any secret of my opposition to privatising nuclear power. I am realistic enough to know, though, that once it has been sold off, it will not, barring a catastrophe, be brought back to the public sector. I hope that the debate will give due warning to those considering investing in the industry that the sums do not add up. Later on, taxpayers will not take kindly to being asked to cough up more so as to subsidise the segregated fund.

If the Government cannot meet their responsibilities, the sooner we get a Government who are prepared to do that, the better. The plain fact is that we do not know with any certainty what the costs will be. The Government have consistently chosen the rosiest scenarios, and the figures on which they have based their expectations have almost always been those that are most trouble free. I am not a Jeremiah when it comes to the nuclear industry—I happen to think that it has performed well in some ways—but I am not prepared to watch the industry being handed over to the private sector with no proper consideration being given to the costs of decommissioning or even to the form of that decommissioning. Neither am I convinced that the quinquennial review will be sensitive enough to deal with the problems as they arise.

Within two or three years, and before the five-year cycle is up, there could be serious financial difficulties which taxpayers, not shareholders, will be called upon to deal with. The industry is of great strategic importance. Consequently, it should not be thrown away, and its problems and disadvantages should not be treated as lightly as the Government have approached them this evening.

8.8 pm

Mr. Piers Merchant (Beckenham): I suppose that these days I should begin by declaring a transient interest, in that my wife and I were taken to the ballet about a year ago by Dr. Robert Hawley and his wife. He, of course, is the former chief executive of Nuclear Electric and the current chief executive of British Energy. I hasten to add that we did not discuss the nuclear industry or its privatisation. I mention that—apart from feeling that I ought to—because I know Bob Hawley well. In fact, I worked with him when he led Northern Engineering Industries, the north-east engineering conglomerate.

I am in a position to make a judgment—which is that this man has a tremendous ability in engineering, as well as great experience in private industry. I believe that he will give great leadership to the industry in the private sector. That is important because the House and the public are right to be concerned about the quality of leadership, particularly in an industry that is obviously sensitive.

I strongly support the movement of the nuclear industry into the private sector. I have become a great believer in privatisation, based on my judgment of the experience of privatised industries over the past 15 years. I did not come to the subject in any dogmatic sense and, unlike many of my hon. Friends, I did not start with a strong presumption that only the private sector could deliver the quality and efficiency that we now see in the industries that have been transferred from the state. I have applied my judgment and watched as the industries have been transferred. We have seen a watershed in the development of industry in this country. In industry after industry, successes and efficiencies have sprung from competition.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade referred to just one statistic week, but it tells a story. Before privatisation, the industries were costing the taxpayer £50 million a week; the taxpayer is now gaining, in terms of tax paid, approximately £55 million a week. That is only one aspect of it. The benefits that have flowed to consumers are tremendous and the opportunities that the industries have been able to develop are significant.

Three areas in the nuclear industry will gain. First, the consumer will gain because the electricity industry will have additional competition, which will produce greater efficiency. We have already heard that the average electricity bill is likely to be reduced by some £20 as a result of the fall in the fossil fuel levy, which has been made possible as a result of the privatisation that is now going into effect. That benefit will be felt by every consumer of electricity.

Secondly, taxpayers will benefit directly from the proceeds of the sale. They will also benefit as a result of the transfer of liabilities. I have done a quick calculation in my head—approximately £4.4 billion-worth of liabilities will be transferred from the taxpayer to the private sector. That is a significant benefit to the taxpayer.

Thirdly, the industry will benefit in a number of ways: it will be able to make its own commercial judgments, to run its affairs free from political interference, to decide on its investment programme and its capital plans, and—perhaps most significant of all—be free to operate competitively in the international market.

That is a significant market, and a market in which British experience excels. More than 30 countries have nuclear plants in operation or are building plants that are yet to be commissioned. The expertise that the British nuclear industry has to offer is tremendous. Significant markets can be grasped and, if the industry is free to do so, it will benefit significantly. Privatisation will enable that to happen.

Understandably, there is bound to be some public concern about this privatisation. There is always public concern about change. The public have always been sceptical, if not hostile, about privatisation—but they have slowly changed their views as they have seen the successes and benefits that it has brought. This is a particularly sensitive industry and it is understandable that people should be concerned and need to be assured about the safety aspects. It is regrettable that the Labour party has, at times, sought to exploit that fear, which it knows is groundless. The subject has been examined in great detail by a number of bodies involved.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that there is no such thing as total safety? Therefore, we can predict that, some time in the future, there will be safety problems. Is he confident that the insurance arrangements, and the premiums that have to be paid, are sufficient? Chernobyl is often referred to, but it was a different type of power station. I refer also to Three Mile Island in America and to the PWR, which was a forerunner to Sizewell. That is an important element. There is a lack of public confidence in the industry and the only way that it can be restored is by ensuring that there is proper provision to protect the public when an accident happens.

Mr. Merchant: The hon. Gentleman is right: there have been problems relating to safety in the nuclear industry. However, I remind him that it is not the only industry to be affected in that way. We cannot guarantee total safety in any industry or in any walk of life. However, it is particularly important in this industry that the safety measures, and the policing of them, are taken to the highest level possible. I believe that they have been, and I shall return to that point in a moment.

The hon. Gentleman referred specifically to insurance. He is absolutely right: it is important that the industry is properly and fully insured. He asked me whether I believe that it is adequately insured. Yes, I believe that the arrangements that exist for the industry, and the international arrangements that underpin it, are satisfactory and sufficient to ensure proper protection in the unlikely event of something going seriously wrong.

There are nuclear power stations in this and many other countries. It is true that they pose a potential risk. However, if the hon. Gentleman imagines that there is a link between the extent of safety protection involved and the nature of the ownership, I hope that I can convince him that that is not the case. The Trade and Industry Select Committee looked at this issue thoroughly, and it concluded that there was no reason why there should be any greater safety risk under privatised ownership than there had been under state ownership.

The Health and Safety Executive has examined the problem, and it has said that there is no evidence to suggest that there would be any greater risk under privatisation. The industry has also been examined by the World Association of Nuclear Operators, which has said that there is no evidence to suggest that a privately owned industry carries with it any greater safety risk.

I believe that the reverse is true. The hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) mentioned the horrific accident at Chernobyl. I remind him that the Russian nuclear industry was not in private hands. Indeed, one could say that the Russian nuclear industry was operating in a society that had taken state control to its ultimate conclusion. The significance of that is that there is a tendency in a command economy for the individuals within the structure not to feel a personal responsibility. Therefore, corners are cut, the buck is passed and the system—in this case, the vital safety system—collapses. That is precisely what happened at Chernobyl.

Mr. Purchase: Will the hon. Gentleman concede that the incident at Three Mile Island occurred while the industry was in private ownership? Is he aware that the costs resulting from that incident have not yet been resolved?

Mr. Merchant: I am aware of those factors, but the worst nuclear accident occurred at Chernobyl. I do not intend to divert attention from accidents that have occurred in the private sector, and the hon. Gentleman points correctly to one of them. I do not suggest that privatisation automatically means that there is no risk at all: I am merely rebutting the claims made by some members of the public—egged on by Labour Members—that privatisation in itself brings a greater risk. That is palpably not true.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a great danger of unfounded scaremongering on that point? The allegations made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) about the Three Mile Island incident are not properly founded in fact, and that point has been well established.

Mr. Merchant: My hon. Friend is correct. I wish to quote the comments of two organisations on the safely issue as I believe that it is important to lay to rest the myths that have been propagated in that area. The leading economic consultants, NERA, recently published a report on the impact on safety of privatisation in a number of industries, including the nuclear industry. It concluded:

"Occupational safety standards have improved in nearly all of the privatised firms and industries. In some cases the extent of improvement" in safety standards

"has been significantly greater than elsewhere in the economy . . . the incidence of such injuries" to members of the general public

"is very low on average across the privatised firms and industries . . . the performance of privatised companies has improved strongly since privatisation".

My second quotation comes from British Energy. I think that it is important to take account of its view, as it will ultimately be responsible for the industry. Peter Haslam, the director of public affairs, wrote to me in March. He said:

"Whilst the regulatory regime in relation to safety will remain fundamentally unchanged, some people may see the relationship between the NII and the Company as more transparent than whilst both were in the public sector. Safety is paramount and both Nuclear Electric and Scottish Nuclear have a Director with responsibility for safety who reports directly to their respective Chairmen. Each event of any nuclear safety significance is investigated with the utmost rigour and importance is placed upon creating a culture of openness. Moreover, the companies achieved a very real improvement in their safety records from the time of Vesting hand-in-hand with a much improved commercial performance. Profit and safety are not antithetical".

I stress that it is clear that the nuclear industry will maintain safety as paramount. None of the structures that have been set up will be diminished—indeed, they will be enhanced. The independent role of the nuclear installations inspectorate and other agencies responsible for safety will be retained. Those independent bodies will ensure that standards are maintained.

Significantly, the people within the industry will ultimately ensure that high standards are achieved. Within British Energy, we have highly qualified, highly motivated engineers, nuclear scientists and managers who have an absolute interest in safety. They will not compromise their standards, quality or integrity in any way. I have complete faith in them. If their integrity is questioned, they know that they ultimately carry personal responsibility within a privatised set-up—far more than in the state sector. If anything goes wrong, there will be no hesitation in pointing the finger at them as individuals. Therefore, they will not take any risks.

If that assurance is not sufficient, we know that they are driven by a commercial motive. They know that, at the end of the day, far from putting profit before safety, the maintenance of the profitability of their company is absolutely dependent on their ensuring that safety is paramount. If anything were to go wrong, the enormous costs incurred would wipe out the company's profit for years to come.

For all those reasons, I believe that a myth has been propagated about safety in a privatised nuclear industry. I believe that the industry will be safer in privatised hands, and that any concerns are misplaced. Above all, I believe that privatisation of the industry will bring enormous benefits to the country, to its people—to the consumer and the taxpayer—and to a great, innovative British industry. For those reasons, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the verve with which he has pursued the privatisation, and I am delighted that it is virtually in place.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I shall keep my remarks fairly short. I have spoken about this matter twice before in the House and I do not intend to restate the issues. Even at this late stage in the Government's plans, I stress that the privatisation is wrong and will prove hugely costly to the British taxpayer. It also carries some risks that I do not believe the people of this country will accept. Therefore, I urge the Government to think again.

The privatisation and the sweeteners that have been offered to the private sector have incurred criticism from the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. The European Commission has launched an investigation into illegal state aid and we have watched the barely concealed warring between British Energy and the Government over the scale of the liabilities that should follow assets into the private sector.

In spite of the Minister's remarks, it now appears that the war has been well and truly won by private sector interests. We have yet to count the costs that the public will pay through job losses and a tax bill that is likely to run into billions of pounds. There have been repeated ministerial pledges that the taxpayer will not lose out, but the recently published prospectus does not back them up. Amid confusion about the detailed figures, one thing is striking: the taxpayer will be significantly worse off after privatisation.

As the motion points out, proceeds from the sale of the nuclear power stations that are up for grabs are likely to be less than the cost of building Sizewell B alone. In a previous debate on the subject, I described the nuclear industry as a white elephant. Although I was taken to task on that occasion by the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie), I stand by my words. How can something that is eventually sold for less than it took to build, and which will be a cost to the taxpayer well into the next millennium, be described as anything but a white elephant?

The money that must be paid out will go towards decommissioning the white elephant. Pledges that the private sector would shoulder the cost of cleaning up the power stations after privatisation have been quietly and comprehensively ditched. Long-term bills for the seven advanced gas-cooled reactors and the Sizewell B pressurised water reactor—amounting to an estimated £6.9 billion—will fall on the taxpayer. Even taking into account the likely proceeds from the sale, that leaves the public sector at least £1.2 billion poorer after privatisation. Why must the taxpayer cover that huge cost? The answer is simple: the privatisation would be impossible if the private sector took on all liabilities as well as the so-called assets of the nuclear industry.

Sir Michael Grylls (North–West Surrey): The hon. Gentleman is talking about the costs of an industry or a product. If he were selling his car, its cost would be quite irrelevant. The price that he gets for it is the price in the market. The price at which people who have applied for shares in this privatisation is the price that they are prepared to pay. He must understand that the price has nothing whatever to do with the cost of the industry.

Mr. Taylor: When we sell a car, that should be the last we see of it. The peculiarity of the nuclear industry is that, once the individual who has bought the car has finished with it, the car is returned and we face an even larger cost for scrapping it safely.

We now know that British Energy is to be exempted from at least some of the costs of reprocessing spent fuel—worth £17 billion. We now know that British Energy is paying only £16 million a year into the fund to pay for the cost of the clean-up operation—which is estimated to be a £3.6 billion saving in comparison with a more realistic and appropriate amount. We now know that the long-term fund assumes investment rates that are likely to leave the taxpayer with a lump sum bill of at least £1.6 billion. Whichever way privatisation is viewed, it is difficult to escape the reality that, yet again, the taxpayer is expected by the Government to subsidise shareholders' profits.

As I have said in the House before, the British public have already paid towards decommissioning through the fossil fuel levy on electricity bills, which has raised £1.8 billion. That public money was diverted to building Sizewell B. Given that the taxpayer is being asked to fork out again for decommissioning, will the Government return that money to the British public? Clearly, the answer is no.

Let us not forget that the privatised power stations are not the only nuclear power stations that will, at some point, need to be decommissioned. What of the Magnox stations—the dirtiest nuclear power stations in the world? They are too much of a liability for even the Government to attempt to privatise them. Who is to pay for that decommissioning? The answer, once again, is the taxpayer. Any profits from the advanced gas-cooled reactors should be going into a decommissioning fund that will cover the eventual cost of all the power stations, but instead it will go into the pockets of British Energy shareholders.

I simply do not believe that there is any way in which private sector efficiencies can cover the liabilities, or the loss of the income stream that the Government would have had for meeting those liabilities—an income stream that we know was inadequate because the Government accept that it is unlikely that the privatised industry will be building any further nuclear power stations. In other words, it is not worth their while. Profits will simply not cover the real costs of the industry.

At the very least, do the Government agree that proceeds from the privatisation should be specifically designated to help meet Magnox public sector liabilities? The proceeds would probably not cover the cost of decommissioning the Magnox stations, but they would certainly go some way towards doing so. The proceeds should be placed in a segregated fund, and perhaps, the Government could add to them the £228 million gifted by the taxpayer to British Energy in the form of an endowment—a gift that remains totally without justification.

As we have already heard in this debate, this privatisation raises serious questions about safety in the nuclear industry. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) that safety issues should be underrated, although I am glad that he accepts that the nuclear industry carries safety risks. Not all Conservative Members would even accept that. I credit him with being honest. After that, we can disagree or not about whether those risks are worth bearing.

When I spoke in a previous debate on the nuclear industry, I was accused by a Labour Member of scaremongering about safety. I do not think that it is scaremongering to remind the Government of the submission made to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry by Captain Killick, the former director of safety and quality at Scottish Nuclear. He sought to remind the Government that a privatised nuclear industry is likely to "seek to make small erosions into safety margins for commercial gain."

I do not think that that personally criticises individuals. It is simply in the nature of the profit-centred job that they will be carrying out. The hon. Member for Beckenham was over-optimistic on that front. If a former director of safety and quality in the nuclear industry is concerned at the safety implications of privatisation, surely it is not scaremongering to take those concerns seriously.

Leaked internal documents from the Clifford Chance law firm show that the Government have been warned that cuts in manpower are compromising safety. Do the Government accept that advice, or do they dismiss it, too, as scaremongering? We have learnt that vital safety information was omitted from the privatisation prospectus. We have learnt that nuclear inspectors are increasingly concerned about the loss of skills in the industry and the ability to cope with an emergency. Do the Government consider them to be scaremongering too? As more and more details about privatisation are brought into the public domain, this privatisation makes less and less sense.

Standing in the Chamber today, it is difficult not to feel a sense of deja vu. We are debating for the third time what everyone knows, but which the Government in their quest for privatisation and short-term Government revenue at any cost still refuse to admit: the proposed sale of the nuclear industry is an expensive error of judgment that will cost the taxpayer dear. The Government's approach to the privatisation can be described only as deceitful and inept. We have received assurance after assurance from Ministers that liabilities will follow assets into the private sector. Those assurances have been steadily watered down over recent months, as the extent to which Parliament has been misled has been slowly uncovered.

The Liberal Democrats have not opposed every privatisation that the Government have proposed. We have sought to address them one by one.

Mr. Eggar: I think that I heard the hon. Gentleman say that Parliament had been misled. I am sure that he did not mean to say that; perhaps he could withdraw that comment.

Mr. Taylor: I think that what the Government have said is misleading. For example, in the previous debate on this subject, I said that the Government had gifted £265 million of taxpayers' money to the privatised nuclear industry. Ministers and others argued that it was not taxpayers' money, but the truth is that that money would otherwise rest with the taxpayer. On a number of other issues, the way in which this privatisation has been addressed is misleading. I do not think that that is unparliamentary or inaccurate.

As I said, the Liberal Democrats have not opposed all privatisations. We have been open to some, and criticised others because of concerns about the way in which industry will respond to those who use the privatised industries, especially utilities such as water. I think that we have been proved right on that.

On nuclear privatisation, the error goes more to the heart of the way in which the Government approach such issues. The Liberal Democrats believe that this privatisation is wholly financially mistaken. Since the Government are not stupid, the privatisation must be about getting short-term returns before the general election and the need for short-term tax cuts. In the long run, the proposed privatisation will be a financial disaster for the British public, and the House should put a stop to it.

Sir Michael Grylls (North–West Surrey): I should like to follow the remarks of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), but I think that the point I made in my intervention was right. The value of something is its marketplace value, and that is what we should be considering, but we have been around that course. Decommissioning costs, as the hon. Gentleman knows very well, since he has been talking about them, have been dealt with very effectively through the segregated fund. I know that some of my hon. Friends have been very patient and want to speak, so I shall be brief.

Privatisation of the nuclear industry is one more step down the path of the innumerable privatisations that we have successfully launched and seen through during the past 16 years. The hon. Member for Truro said that it is all about money. Governments need money, and taxpayers resent being robbed of too much money, but a much more important reason for privatisation—I say this seriously to the hon. Gentleman—is freeing industry from the dead hand of government. I include our Government in that. I may be able to take the hon. Gentleman with me at least some of the way, because he has just said that his party has not opposed all the privatisations. My recollection is that the Liberal Democrats have not been very enthusiastic about them, but I shall not go down that path.

The real point is that Governments of all complexions have been bad owners of businesses. Business is the real bottom line. Our post-war history shows that to be true. Governments have been bad owners because they have not looked at businesses in a commercial or industrial way. Too often we—I include the Labour party, and I am sure that the Conservative party has done this in the past as well—have been tempted by short-term political advantage to freeze prices in the Post Office or, when the Post Office ran telecommunications, to say that it should not put up prices because a general election was coming up, or to tell British Airways, when it was owned by the Government, that although it had plenty of passengers it could not buy any more aircraft because the Government thought that the electorate would be more impressed if they spent money on schools or hospitals.

The argument has only to be put in that way to show how absurd is the ownership of industry by government. We are bad owners. We look at things in the wrong way. We are politicians. Let us be frank: we are concerned with garnering the votes when a general election or a by-election comes along. We would not be here otherwise. Those are the things that guide us; we should not have industries near us with which we can play around.

I remember Sir Ian MacGregor saying, when he was looking after British Coal—he also successfully guided British Steel to privatisation—that when he made decisions they reverberated all the way down the organisation, and the Secretary of State would be on the telephone asking why he was doing what he proposed, was he sure it was the right thing to do and might it not be better to think again because there was to be a question in the House, or the Select Committee wanted everyone up in front of it. Businesses cannot be run in that way.

My first point is that freeing this industry is just one more step down the path of getting industry out of the hands of government—out of state control, freeing it to make its own decisions, get its own investment and recruit its own people. Some of my hon. Friends will remember when some nationalised industries could not recruit, for example, the best finance director for their businesses because they were not allowed by statute to pay them more than a certain sum of money. The Minister was nervous of saying that a finance director should be paid X in case people said that that was a lot of money and he was blamed. Putting it that way shows the absurdity of it all, but that was the world in which we lived before. Changing that world is what privatisation has been about.

If there is change, and people are allowed to run businesses properly and efficiently according to private sector rules and away from politics, in the end—as we have seen with the other privatisations—consumers will benefit. I believe that exactly the same will happen with the nuclear industry. There will be price cuts for the benefit of consumers.

We in the House of Commons should be proud that, in the earlier privatisation of the rest of the electricity industry, we were one of the first countries, including the United States of America, to try—to a large extent we have been successful—to create a competitive market for electricity. That was done not for the Conservative party, not for doctrinaire reasons, not to bring in the money, but for the benefit of consumers. Consumers who gain from a competitive marketplace.

All sorts of clever people can write articles saying that the present electricity market, with a regulator, the pool and all the complications, is not perfect—I am sure that they can make some cogent arguments—but we should take some credit from the fact that we have started, and the market will be refined as the years go by. It is right that we should have privatised electricity generation and that we are now successfully introducing privatisation of the nuclear industry.

I grant the hon. Member for Truro that the establishment of the segregated fund is a fudge in a sense, because nuclear is special. His riposte to me was right, but I think that I, too, am right to say that the actual cost has no relationship to the market price. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is a fudge, but it is a balancing act between the contribution that the Government rightly feel that taxpayers should pay for decommissioning, and the contribution that the shareholders will pay for decommissioning. We can argue that the figures should be different, that there should be more for one and less for the other, but that again is a judgment that the Government have had to make. That judgment has to be right, or the privatisation will not be successful.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: My problem is that the Government are sacrificing a known income stream. If someone is to take it over, they have to make a profit, so there must be a loss on that. The only way of making that up is by making efficiency gains in the industry, but nobody will be building new privatised nuclear stations—so how can there be a sufficient gain for the shareholders and how can the Government's return make up for the loss of the income stream? The figures do not add up and nothing the Government have published suggest that they do.

Sir Michael Grylls: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait and see what the efficiency gains will be. We cannot prejudge the matter. It would be ridiculous for me to say that they will be X, Y or Z, and it would be equally ridiculous for him to say that they will not be X, Y or Z. We can, however, make a judgement on the basis of experience. There is no doubt in my mind that the Government underestimated the costs that could be taken out of the regional electricity companies. They were even more inefficient than we thought they were when we privatised them, and huge costs have been taken out of them. I do not know whether there will be such a big cost reduction in the nuclear industry. Let us say that it will not be so much, but I am sure that there will be a large cost reduction in getting away from the Government and running the industry efficiently.

We should also knock on the head the question of safety. Of course it is paramount. In a way, that is a ridiculous thing to say. That is true of any industry. There is nothing particularly special about the nuclear industry, except that a disaster such as occurred at Chernobyl is horrific. In an ordinary factory, a few people are hurt, which is terrible, but it is not a massive disaster that affects thousands of people. It is a question of scale, but the principle is the same.

Parliament has laid down, as hon. Members know, in the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, how industries should be run safely. The Health and Safety Executive has clearly said that it is happy with the arrangement. If it is not, it will tell the company, and the company will make changes. Once an industry is in the private sector, its directors have a clear responsibility for safety and, ultimately, they can end up in prison if they neglect their duties. It is a serious business for the people who run companies.

I am sure—I think that the House will agree—that the industry will apply the same rigorous approach to safety whether it is in the public or the private sector. It could be argued that it might be even more rigorous in the private sector, because people's personal futures and the shareholders will be involved. I believe that it will be exactly the same. I compliment those who have worked for so long in the British nuclear industry on the very high standards that have been attained, and which I am sure will be maintained in the future—so we need not have any concerns about that. The structure is in place, through health and safety legislation, the Health and Safety Executive, the duties of the directors and the general responsibilities of the nuclear inspectorate. It is a tightly regulated industry, and quite rightly.

I am confident that this privatisation will follow the path of earlier privatisations, and be another success. I hope that it will be. Some hon. Members have always been against the nuclear industry. I do not want in any way to deride them, because we are all entitled to our view, but it is wrong to carry those views forward to an industry that is successful, has a good safety record, and now has the opportunity to proceed into the private sector. I hope that it will do very well.

Perhaps we should compare the nuclear industry with the mining industry, which has now been successfully privatised. Nobody suggests that, in private hands, coal mines are less safe than they were under public ownership. I do not think that anyone has made that claim. Perhaps they did during debates on privatisation of the coal industry, but I do not think that any hon. Member has said since privatisation that they are being run dangerously. The coal industry has applied stringent and strict safety measures, just as the nuclear industry will when it is in the private sector.

I compliment the Government on this privatisation, and believe that the House will see that it is one more successful privatisation, and one more toy taken out of the hands of government and placed where it should be—in the hands of professional managers.

8.52 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The hon. Member for North-West Surrey (Sir M. Grylls) recognised the uniqueness of the nuclear industry but failed to develop that point. Had he done so, he would have recognised that that uniqueness marks it out as an industry that should remain in the public sector.

The United Kingdom's nuclear industry is unique in that it is made up of a mix of stations that are peculiarly British in design, with the exception of the pressurised water reactor. Although the industry lacks the uniformity that is found in some countries—for example, France—the stations are linked in most important ways, so it just does not make any economic sense to privatise the advanced gas-cooled reactors and PWRs and separate them from the Magnox stations.

Together, the AGRs and PWRs have massive liabilities. Magnox stations will be the first stations to be decommissioned, and as a PWR station costs some £3 billion and may have a life of some 30 years, it should be part of the public sector so that the income stream that it generates can go towards meeting the enormous liabilities that will have to be met. The House may be aware that the Sadnicki report, which was published on 5 June this year, showed that it is likely that the public sector will be left with liabilities of some £6.9 billion as a result of this privatisation.

I must question some of the points that the Minister made, because on this privatisation the Government have been consistently economical with the truth. They know full well that, if they put their cards on the table, they would not attract investors to the industry. Even though they have kept a veil over certain information, they have still had to use at least £100 million to attract investors.

In the nuclear review, the Government said that the full liability would follow the asset. This evening, I heard the President of the Board of Trade confirm that from the Dispatch Box, but there is still much scepticism. I share some of the fears voiced by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats. The House will be aware that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry reported after making a thorough study, yet it was, to some degree, sceptical about the breadth of the segregated fund.

The Select Committee made two recommendations in that regard: first, that the Government should establish more reliable arrangements to ensure that long-term liabilities arising after the closure of the stations are discharged; and secondly, that the Government should set out in detail in the prospectus for British Energy their conclusions about the appropriate level of contributions to the segregated fund, and that the level of provision for that fund should be prudent.

As far as I am aware, that detail has not appeared in the prospectus; because it has been light on information, people are sceptical of the Government's motives. Liabilities for both Magnox and the AGRs, with PWRs, are massive. In undiscounted terms, they are £31.6 billion. Those for the AGRs and PWRs are £14.6 billion. If the Government are correct in what they have been telling the House, the whole of that £14.6 billion will follow the asset.

When we examine the position a little more closely, however, we see that there are certain questions to be raised. The Sadnicki report, published on 5 June, claims that liabilities of £6.9 billion will be left in the public sector. The report begins by looking at the segregated fund. The fund provides for British Energy to contribute just £16 million annually, but the report suggests that that sum should be increased by 800 per cent., to £127 million a year, if the liabilities are to be met.

The report also discusses the discounting of liabilities that already rest with British Nuclear Fuels plc, which—in terms of fuel that has been reprocessed by BNFL—is estimated to be worth some £4 billion. Sadnicki's analysis suggests that the Government will reduce that to just £1.7 billion. The report also examines the way in which the Government are applying the interest rate. It considers the 2 per cent. that Government actuaries advise to be insufficient to ensure that the fund will accrue enough to meet all its liabilities.

Let me sum up the report's analysis. It suggests that the public sector will be left with liabilities of £6.9 billion, but that is not the end of the story: the £6.9 billion will be in addition to the £17 billion of liabilities already created by the Magnox stations. In other words, the public sector is likely to be left with a massive £23.9 billion of liabilities as a result of privatisation. It would seem to any sensible person that an industry that creates the liabilities created by the nuclear industry must provide the income stream that the newer stations are able to provide in order to meet such liabilities; in this instance, however, the income stream will go into the private sector, and those massive liabilities will fall on the taxpayer.

Much has been said about safety. I do not want to cover ground that has already been covered in our last debate, but I wish to draw attention to the latest report by the law firm Clifford Chance, which was asked to carry out a survey of the industry and report to the Government. In that report, which has been made available, Clifford Chance stresses that the reduction in skilled manpower in the nuclear industry could lead to error. The industry relies on highly skilled manpower, and in an industry such as this mistakes can be disastrous.

None of that information has been published in the prospectus, but Barclays de Zoete Wedd—the company that has been advising the Government—suggests that the industry will be able to make a profit only by increasing the performance of AGRs from its current 72 per cent. to 82.5 per cent., an enormous leap. The AGRs have so far achieved an operating performance of no more than 74 per cent., back in 1985, and 82.5 per cent. does not seem achievable. Those who are using the prospectus as a guide to investment should have had that information, so that they could make a judgment. The Government know full well however that, if the Clifford Chance report were made available to them, they would decide not to invest after one look at it, because there are so many risks.

The last time we debated the issue, I told the House about the informal network in the industry that passes information from station to station and from engineer to engineer. That is particularly important in relation to safety. When those who gave evidence to the Trade and Industry Select Committee were questioned, they said that there would continue to be no such thing as commercial confidentiality to cut across the network. Since then, I have had the opportunity to talk to senior people in the industry, who now believe that commercial confidentiality is likely to reign. That means that an important network, along which a good deal of information about safety is passed, is likely to be cut. Again, that will add to risk in the nuclear industry.

One of the other things to which the Minister has not referred and which was in the Clifford Chance report concerns liabilities in relation to common law damages. I note, for example, that The Guardian today refers to the report on the issue. The Guardian suggests that the 20,000 "radiation workers" who have been close to radiation—workers who are currently in the industry and who have worked in it—face a high cancer risk, and that, by the end of the century, each year, 200 people who have worked in that nuclear industry sector are likely to develop cancer.

At present, the industry has a no-faults common law system, but if settlements amount to £20,000 on average, 200 people a year means £4 million of common law liabilities. None of that information, however, appeared in the prospectus. Why was that information not in the prospectus?

The nuclear industry is unique and it needs to be linked together because of the enormous liabilities. When one part of it is privatised, especially the part that comprises newer stations that create an income stream, that income stream is no longer available to deal with the liabilities; consequently, the taxpayer must meet those liabilities.

As I have said, those liabilities are enormous. The segregated fund is not sufficient to be able to cater for them, so clearly the taxpayer will be that much worse off from privatisation. The asset's cash value is extremely low and privatisation would not be possible if sweeteners were not available to investors. If privatisation were abandoned, as it should be, the AGRs and PWRs would be kept in the public sector and the revenue stream that they would generate would go towards dealing with the liabilities. In that sense, it would relieve future taxpayers of having to meet the industry's enormous cost.

9.7 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I have been listening to a litany of hostile speeches by Opposition Members, bashing the nuclear industry and bashing privatisation.

Mr. Battle: Bashing the figures.

Lady Olga Maitland: The Labour party is bashing the figures without any justification. It is sad that, by running down the industry in that way, it does no—

Mr. Clapham: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Lady Olga Maitland: No. I am going to continue, because the hon. Gentleman has had plenty of time to make his remarks.

Mr. Clapham: I want to return to that point.

Lady Olga Maitland: Nevertheless, I am going to continue.

The nuclear industry has been a source of enormous pride to the country. I am delighted by the idea that, at long last, we are going to privatise it, which is marvellous news for customers, for taxpayers and, ultimately, for the nuclear industry.

I first became interested in the industry in the 1960s, a long time ago, when my father was known as Patrick Maitland and was the prospective Member of Parliament for Caithness and Sutherland. I remember going around Dounreay, which was up and running and a thriving show for the future: there was no doubt about it. Ultimately, we will run out of fossil fuels and everyone, everywhere will have to rely on the nuclear industry. I had an opportunity to learn at first hand how it would become part of our everyday lives and how not only we but our children would depend on it. Dounreay meant a great deal for the whole country and brought a tremendous amount of vibrancy to the local economy in terms of jobs and infrastructure.

Moving on from those early days, it is exciting to think what privatisation will do for the industry and the country. Nuclear energy will undoubtedly gain much greater commercial freedom. It is appropriate for the Government to hand over all management decisions to the professionals, who know the business and should control investment—so that they no longer have to be influenced by public spending levels or other considerations. The industry should have the freedom to compete for and win business in overseas markets, like any other venture.

The right to manage the industry professionally matters, but so do the industry's customers. We will all benefit from lower electricity bills. Surely there cannot be anything wrong with that prospect. It is absolutely right to support greater competition in the electricity generation market, which will come from greater efficiency, responding to consumer need and lower prices. A typical household electricity bill is set to fall by £20 as a result of nuclear privatisation and will tumble further as time passes. The taxpayer will also benefit. The proceeds of privatisation will go into the public purse, which must be good news, and the company's liabilities will be transferred from the public to the private sector—which will then take responsibility and run the risks.

I acknowledge that safety is paramount, but I intensely dislike Labour's exploitation of that aspect for political purposes, to frighten people when there are no grounds for doing so. Scaremongering about the nuclear industry has been going on a long time and is unacceptable. In the 1980s, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament concerned itself with defence issues; but as soon as it started losing that argument, CND turned its attention to the nuclear industry for political purposes and tried to terrorise the public into feeling uncertain and uncomfortable. If such propagandists think that they are winning, they are wrong. The Government have consistently put a high price on safety. There is no reason, just because the industry is to be privatised, for anyone to believe that safety will be jeopardised.

The existing regulatory mechanisms will remain in place. The nuclear installations inspectorate will continue to enforce safety. Other bodies that have offered an opinion are in no doubt that safety will be properly regulated and rigorously applied. The Select Committee on Trade and Industry, after extensive investigation, concluded that the privatisation of British Energy need not result in any reduction in safety.

"aware of no evidence to suggest that the ownership (i. e. public or private) has any bearing on the level of safety and reliability achieved".

As my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) pointed out in his speech, the Health and Safety Executive has made clear its support; it has no doubts about the matter.

In the light of all that evidence and that strong support, I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) should, on a quite unfounded basis, turn up the fear factor.

Mr. Battle: She has not.

Lady Olga Maitland: The right hon. Lady issued a press release on 17 November last year, which stated:

"people have all along feared that safety would take second place to the Conservatives' need to raise money for tax cuts".

If that is not blatant scaremongering for political purposes—without any foundation whatsoever—I do not know what is. That quotation tells me and everyone else one thing: Labour is certainly not fit to govern.

I am delighted with this debate. I am delighted that we have had the opportunity to welcome the privatisation of a very important part of British industry. I have absolutely no doubt that everyone will benefit, that the electorate will feel comfortable about the way in which we are transferring the industry into the private sector and that they will give it their total support.

9.15 pm

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North–East): It comes ill from the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) and from Conservative Members generally to complain that Opposition Members have in some way for political purposes raised the spectre of a nuclear incident. It comes very ill from them because the purpose of this privatisation is completely political—to get a few more quid in the jam jar so that the Government can give it away in tax cuts to sweeten the electorate before the next general election. If anyone is playing politics with the nuclear industry, the blame rests fairly and squarely on Conservative Members. There should be no doubt about that in people's minds.

It is interesting that at least two Conservative Members who have spoken in this debate—especially the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant)—made the point that, in general, safety records of former Government-owned utilities have improved since privatisation. A report which came out only a few days ago stated that safety records had improved.

In the years between privatisation and now, would it not be amazing if gains had not been made in industry and plant safety and operation? It would have been even more amazing if, in 1945, we had nationalised the coal industry, for example, on the basis that we wanted to improve safety. It would have been even more amazing had real gains in safety not been made.

As technology moves on, men and women work more safely, and processes, efficiency and effectiveness are improved. Those are normal developments in a dynamic technology, and they have occurred in this and in many other industries. It would therefore be quite extraordinary if the claim that safety records have improved could not be substantiated.

The point is that the nuclear industry's safety record should be second to none—a point that Opposition Members have repeatedly proclaimed. The point is that privatisation—or commercialisation—brings to bear unnecessary pressure on workers to cut corners, to increase productivity to meet specific financial targets. That is particularly relevant to safety in the nuclear industry, because, so far as possible, nuclear reactors must continue working without interruption if they are to operate most economically.

Very often—three times recently—we have heard about incidents in which a reactor should have been closed down but was closed down too late or not at all. Fines have been levied for those incidents. We are introducing an unnecessary commercial imperative into the industry. The British nuclear industry has one of the best safety records. It is continuing to make considerable productivity gains and, for as long as the installations remain in commission, it will continue to produce electricity at a lower and lower cost.

Sir Michael Grylls: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully. He said that the pressures on a privatised nuclear industry would make it less safe. If he could point to any of the industries that we have privatised in all these years in which that has happened, his argument might have some strength. I cannot recall any that have become less safe because of commercial pressures in the private sector.

Mr. Purchase: The hon. Gentleman need not exercise his memory any longer. Right now, the level of injuries in the coal industry is rising.

Mr. Eggar indicated dissent.

Mr. Purchase: It is true. The level is much higher than it was under the National Coal Board.

The issue of ownership is now in the political frame for both sides of the House and there is merit in arguing that it is outcome, not process, that is important. The nuclear industry is special, because the inherent dangers of an accident are tumultuous compared to those from any other form of energy generation. Because of that, it is important that it should remain the responsibility of the Government of the day. The Government should not be attempting to get out from under that responsibility.

I mentioned earlier that the incident at Three Mile Island did not involve just a matter of ownership. That nuclear incident almost led to a catastrophe, and to this day, settlements have not been made in the civil courts for those who claim to have suffered injury.

Anyone considering investing in the British nuclear industry, particularly those intending to hold the shares for any length of time—that is another matter—should recognise that the insurable costs that he or she is likely to have to meet will grow year on year as the underwriters and the industry begin to understand that the risks cannot be properly quantified. The message that should go out is that insurance premiums will rise and there is likely to be an increasing liability on the industry in private hands to meet the unquantifiable risks attached to it.

The Secretary of State mentioned the £100 million dividend that will be provided early in the life of this privatisation. He said that it will come about because the industry has a healthy cash flow. It is true that the industry is generating cash, but the Secretary of State will surely recognise that, although the cash flow might appear to be large, it may not necessarily be positive when measured against the company's liabilities either on or off the balance sheet. Cash flow is simply a measure of ability to pay current bills, not past or future bills. In truth, the present liabilities, on a discounted basis or otherwise, are very large. That is why the Government have to make special arrangements to discount at an inappropriate rate.

It is estimated that, by some miracle—Treasury magic—£7 billion has been knocked off the cost of disposing of the liabilities. That has been done very simply. It is not a miracle and is not even a sleight of hand. It is no more than a cheap trick. The Government have changed the discount rate from 2 to 3 per cent. so that the liability is down from £21 billion to £14 billion. One can play that game for ever.

I was privileged to serve on the Committee that considered the Crossrail Bill. The Government became anxious about the liabilities, the costs and the payback on the investment and changed the discount rate the other way. They knocked it down from 8 to 6 per cent. to give a better cash flow. That is merely an accountants's manoeuvre—and they will do what they are told in the interest of serving their political masters. There has been jiggery-pokery in determining the liabilities of the industry.

I shall briefly discuss what the brokers have had to say about the privatisation. [Interruption.] I always listen to what they have to say. I like to see how the shares that I have not got would have been doing had I bought any.

Mr. Lang: Does the hon. Gentleman not let the union do it for him?

Mr. Purchase: I do not at all let the union do it for me.

Justin Urquhart-Stewart of Barclays said:

"This is only for certain people because there are obvious risks. The business isn't even profitable yet."

That bears out what I was saying about paying the dividend from cash flow, which is fully committed before a dividend has been paid. He added:

"Please Sids, don't enter this one."

Eric Hathorn of Henderson Crosthwaite expects stags to make a quick profit when trading starts in the middle of next month. That is because everyone is looking at the short term. No one wants to hold the stock for long; people know that the liabilities will catch up with them. It is good for the stags. Mr. Hathorn will not be classifying the stock as high-quality earnings. He says:

"You cannot feel sure that you will get a steady growth in profits. And if anything goes wrong, you have a scare of BSE proportions."

If that is what the broking world says, other people should be careful.

Finally, decommissioning is a muddle. It was never properly explained or dealt with in the House or in Select Committee. It is estimated that decommissioning costs will amount to some £4 billion, according to the utility's estimates. However, the discounted cost, due to compounding, will be only £700 million. That is what the industry says. The Minister said something similar this evening.

Barclays de Zoete Wedd estimates that decommissioning costs will amount to 11 per cent. of nuclear liabilities. The discount is so large because the period in which funds can be compounded is very long—175 years. Put simply, that means that generations as yet unborn will pick up the price tag for the folly of the Government's privatisation plans for the nuclear industry. It is a special industry for which Government, and Government alone, should bear responsibility. There is no way the Government—in the immortal words of the late John Smith, the "Not me guv, Government"—will properly accept their responsibilities.

The typical lifetime of a modern nuclear power station is 40 years, with perhaps one or two extensions. That is followed by 135 years of decommissioning. That second period starts with three years to remove highly radioactive fuel elements, after which the plant must be left to cool for 130 years.

There are two counts to answer. The liabilities of the industry cannot be properly quantified; nor can the insurance risks. Responsibility for the industry lies solely with the Government of the day. Failure to take responsibility will be paid for not at the next general election, or even the one after, but by generations as yet unborn. That is the responsibility that the Government bear and the burden that they should consider. It is the reason that they should not press on with what they call the final burst, which, unfortunately, in historic language, may prove to be a final solution.

9.29 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North–East (Mr. Purchase), in an excellent speech, referred to the reaction of some of the City brokers to this sale. I shall begin by quoting a comment that appeared in the Lex column of the Financial Times. It started wonderfully:

"Go to a closing down sale, and you expect to pick up something cheap. Certainly, the final offering of the British government's great privatisation bazaar—British Energy, the nuclear generator—looks a classic bargain in the making. Inevitably, many investors will fall back on yield-based valuations which underrate the company's potential to gear up and churn out cash. Furthermore, daunted by British Energy's vulnerable revenues and heavy long-term liabilities, they may even demand a higher yield than even Railtrack fetched."

It is a disgrace that the House has not had the opportunity to debate this privatisation properly in Government time, as it did the privatisation of Railtrack. It is estimated that this privatisation will, in the short term, perhaps raise as much cash as that privatisation. We last debated nuclear privatisation in Opposition time on 26 March. Since then, our detailed questions on the financial deal and the details have never been properly answered. Indeed, as we have seen since the draft prospectus has been published, those questions are even more pertinent now than when we posed them on 26 March.

We still have not received a proper response from the Government on the Floor of the House to the Trade and Industry Select Committee's report on nuclear privatisation. The Government seem determined to push on with it regardless of the costs and, to some extent, in contempt of consideration in the House. Why? On 8 November 1989, the Government were totally opposed to any sale of the nuclear industry. The nuclear industry was withdrawn from the proposed privatisation of the electricity industry.

The then Minister declared in the House that retaining the nuclear industry in the public sector was "the best way of ensuring a long-term future for nuclear power in this country."—[Official Report, 8 November 1989; Vol. 159, c.1174.]

Those were the words of the Minister at the Dispatch Box. Now the Government, in a desperate dash for cash, are day by day sacrificing any long-term interests on the altar of the short-term cash fix, in a final bid to buy back what many of us now regard as their irretrievably lost popularity.

Let us recall the history. On 9 November 1989, the then Secretary of State for Energy, now Lord Wakeham, was adamant. He spoke about the unprecedented guarantees that were being sought by the City if privatisation was even mooted. He said:

"I am not willing to underwrite the private sector in this way."—[Official Report, 9 November 1989; Vol. 159, c. 1171.]

Nuclear power stations were originally kept out of electricity privatisation precisely because, if the liabilities were to follow the assets, those power stations would be totally unattractive to the market. The power stations would have been unsellable and the Government knew that.

So what did the Government have to do? They realised that they had to make nuclear power stations sellable, and did so by fudging the relationship between the liabilities and the assets and pushing as much as they could on to the public sector.

Ever since 4 March this year, when the marketing programme was launched, we have seen nothing but more and more underwriting, as each week has moved towards the final sell-off. New sweeteners have been revealed week by week to make the industry more acceptable to any prospective buyer. It has been the sweetener deal of the century.

Let us not forget that the Government are not privatising all the nuclear industry. That rather kills off the arguments of Conservative Members who have spoken in eulogistic terms about privatisation in principle. This is the Government who decided to privatise a bit of the nuclear industry. They are privatising the seven modern advanced gas-cooled reactors and the new pressurised water reactor, Sizewell B, which was opened only a few weeks ago. They are leaving the nine aging Magnox stations and BNFL behind, leaving all their liabilities in the public sector.

In other words, the Government are flogging off the current cash-generating end of the business, leaving behind in the public sector a large part of the liabilities for reprocessing spent fuel, decommissioning and shutting down nuclear plants, and the management, treatment and disposal of radioactive waste. All those irradiated liabilities are being left behind effectively in the public sector, yet we have repeatedly been told that yes, liabilities will follow assets.

Our opposition to the privatisation of the nuclear industry has been focused around the financing of the deal.

Mr. Miller: I wanted to put this point to the President of the Board of Trade, but he would not give way. Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem might be even worse than he has described because, in recent years, the Magnox stations have been run at an extremely high output level, thus bringing forward embrittlement problems, benefiting the Exchequer to the disadvantage of the new company? Does he think that the short-term attitude adopted by the company emphasises the way that it has appallingly abused a great asset of the country?

Mr. Battle: My hon. Friend pinpoints in detail the short-termism that is going on. He is absolutely right.

I add as a rider that all that we have seen from the Government and in the prospectus is based on a rosy, most optimistic possible assessment. My hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) said that the assumption of the load of the new industry sector was originally set at 82 per cent. for the seven AGRs and Sizewell B. Never in history has that figure been reached. I gather that the Government have dropped the figure to 75 per cent. now, but the best year's performance was 74 per cent., as my hon. Friend said.

Those are incredibly rosy assessments of what will happen to the privatised bit, but they are based, as my hon. Friend said, on what has been happening to what is left behind as a short-term deal to prime the industry for sell-off. In other words, the Government's nuclear sums are skewed in favour of a massively subsidised sweetener deal. That is the reality. Eight power stations are being sold off for less than the price of building one and taxpayers will be left with billions of pounds of nuclear liabilities well into the next century.

Let us look at some nuclear arithmetic. City estimates now say that the sale will raise £1.7 billion. The Government's original estimate was £2.6 billion, yet Sizewell B, the power station that has just been opened, cost £2.964 billion to build in March 1995 prices.

That power station was built from the proceeds of the nuclear levy that was stuck on to everyone's electricity bill, ostensibly to pay for the waste disposal of the liabilities. In other words, electricity consumers paid to build Sizewell B directly, although Parliament was never told about that. The French were, in the deal with the interconnector, but not Parliament.

Then what is revealed to us? On 13 June this year, not in this place but in the House of Lords, the Government conceded that the historic cost of the power station is £9.3 billion. Yes, we do know the difference between market cost and historic cost, but the historic cost does not magically disappear. Even the asset value of British Energy was written down by £1 billion from £6 billion to £5 billion between the publication of last year's accounts and the launch of the prospectus. That £1 billion disappeared from somewhere in the accounts.

In a written reply in May this year, the Minister told his colleague, the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale):

"there has been a permanent diminution in the value of certain nuclear fixed assets of about £1.2 billion" since 31 March 1995. Furthermore, he said:

"the fixed assets will stand in the balance sheet of British Energy at approximately £5 billion."—[Official Report, 10 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 295.]

That was the first time the Government admitted that they had marked down the price by £1 billion at public expense. The liabilities associated with the Magnox stations were valued at £8.5 billion by the Government at the time of the nuclear review, and they were to be met from the £2.6 billion built up from the value of the assets. Now we find that the AGR and PWR sale proceeds will be much less than £2.6 billion, so the shortfall is bound to fall on the general taxpayer.

In that written answer to which I just referred—one of those planted replies that gives us information if we look out for it on a wet Friday afternoon—the Minister said that taxpayers' liabilities would be capped at £3.8 billion—a maximum, not an estimated actual spend. It is reasonable to argue that any gap between the sale proceeds and the amount paid for by taxpayers in this way is a cost to taxpayers—of decommissioning Magnox stations—without the benefits of the revenue stream from the power stations that are being sold off.

I predict that, before many years are out, if the sale proceeds on the terms proposed by the Government, the Public Accounts Committee will find itself exposing a scandal of Pergau dam proportions, as the financial fixing that has gone into preparing British Energy for the market is revealed. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), a member of the Select Committee with great expertise in those matters, used a wonderful parliamentary expression: the best that we can say about the figures, he said, is that the Government are being economical with the truth. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East spoke of accountancy manoeuvring. Both expressions accurately reflect what is going on.

Let us consider the liabilities for a moment, not forgetting that the Government are selling off only the more modern half of the industry. The Government promised that a shortfall in the decommissioning of the older Magnox stations would be met by the sale proceeds, not least because the older Magnox stations will lose the income from the newer nuclear generators. As the sale proceeds will be insufficient to cover the decommissioning costs, Ministers have loaded the £3.8 billion back on the taxpayer.

Certainly, the Government have set up a segregated sinking fund to deal with British Energy's liabilities; but while BE puts in £16 million a year, the public sector companies remaining behind will contribute £228 million after privatisation. In other words, British Energy's clean-up costs come in the form of a dowry—the Secretary of State's word. I understand that a dowry is a gift for setting up a new relationship. In this case, the Government will extract it from the balance sheets of the publicly owned nuclear companies.

I want to ask the Minister again for an answer to a question that we have regularly posed. Is he any clearer yet about the financial relationship between BNFL and the Magnox industry? The Government propose a merger, but neither knows what liabilities it will have to pick up. As Mark Baker of Magnox put it in his evidence to the Select Committee, he is still not fully aware of the eventual shape of his balance sheet.

This is a short-term, short-sighted financial fix—aptly advertised as a final burst of energy at the end of the Government's programme. Perhaps it is their last gasp before they disappear completely. The claims that we have heard tonight about cheaper electricity prices are pretty rich coming from the Conservative party, which slapped VAT on electricity bills. If they removed it, there would be much greater savings than there will be under this scheme.

The long-term future of British Energy remains the great unknown. Will the newly privatised entity continue to sell its electricity through the pool to the grid on privileged terms, or will it be asked to compete on an equal footing with other private generators? This week's Utility Week states:

"British Energy faces the prospect of defaulting on a £500 million loan taken out with five banks as part of its leap into the private sector because of changes to rules . . . This could dent the profitability of the privatised company. Indeed BE's pathfinder prospectus said any Grid Code change having a 'material adverse effect' could be grounds for defaulting on the loan."

I would be interested to hear the Minister's comments on that. What about the dash for gas? It is suggested that British Energy will move away from nuclear energy and move into gas. Everyone is moving into gas, so its prospects as a competitor are being diminished.

No one believes that this is a good long-term investment. Recently, a stockbroker in Yorkshire tried to talk up the prospectus on the radio. He was asked whether he would buy shares and he said, "Certainly not in the long term." He was complimented on his honesty. He said that the shares would be of value only in the short term—that people with £300 to spare will buy on day one, but they will sell on day two and pick up a tidy sum on the way out. It is a subsidised sale.

The Government are selling off taxpayers' assets at a massively knocked-down price—they are trying to get as much liquid cash as they can to prime a pre-election tax bribe. This is a desperate last dash for cash. It should be called off because we will all pay for generations to come. Perhaps it is too late for the Government to call this off, but they ought to allow a party with a longer-term vision to put its prospectus before the British people and to call a general election.

9.45 pm

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): I congratulate the right hon. and hon. Members who have attended the debate—greater men or women hath made no greater sacrifice than to attend the debate this evening. I have a little reservation about the judgment of the Labour Front Bench in choosing this topic at this time. I think that the Scots are more loyal to the alternative attractions than the English, and I can understand why.

It would have been helpful to the reputation of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) and of the House if the hon. Gentleman had made some elementary inquiries before writing his speech. He went on at some length about the absence of accounts for Magnox Electric—yet I have a copy of them in my hand. They were published, and well publicised, at the end of last week. A call to Magnox Electric or to my office would have revealed that, and I would have been delighted to pass them on to the hon. Gentleman.

The main theme of the Labour party's attack—if it can be called that—has been a reprise of the argument that it has used at every privatisation debate. The Labour party has opposed every privatisation over the past 17 years and it has used almost identical arguments every time—although even NERA has come up with a safety analysis that shows that the Labour party's safety scares in relation to privatisation have been ill founded.

We believe that privatisation is good for the customer, good for the company and for the shareholder, and good for the taxpayer. We believe that the privatisation of Nuclear Electric will be as successful as previous privatisations.

I have enjoyed one particular aspect of the debate. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North–East (Mr. Purchase) did something quite remarkable: he obviously sat down with the Financial Times and a great mound of brokers' circulars at his side last Sunday night and worked out the best investment opportunities for the Purchase household. He came across selective quotations from particular brokers, on the flotation of British Energy.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the capitalist world and to the world of wealth creation. I have a wonderful image of him up there in the north sitting behind his reproduction oak desk. Now that he is a modern new Labour man, perhaps he is linked to the Internet. If the reports were on the screen in front of him, he would not have to look through a great mound of documents. I have obviously impugned the hon. Gentleman, so I shall give way.

Mr. Purchase: I have been involved in wealth creation for almost all my working life. I use the tools of the trade and not the Financial Times. I was the chap who created the production output for the Financial Times to write about.

Mr. Eggar: I am delighted with that rewriting of history. I wish the hon. Gentleman well in his new career as a stock market analyst—I am sure that it will enhance his prospects under new Labour.

Safety was a recurring theme in hon. Members' speeches. I make it absolutely clear that there is no way in which the Government or the company will imperil safety. While I was absent from the Chamber, I understand that the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) referred to today's Guardian article. The story was totally predictable—only yesterday afternoon, I guessed that The Guardian would run another nuclear scare story this morning. True to form, it did just that and, true to form, that story proved to be as unfounded as the previous ones.

What I found particularly reprehensible about the article—I understand that the hon. Gentleman referred to this point—was its reference to the national average risk of dying from cancer. It is true that, nationally, the average risk of dying from cancer is one in four. However, in practice and as a matter of fact, it is not the case that nuclear workers are at a greater risk of contracting cancer. Research shows categorically that average cancer rates among workers in the nuclear industry are below the national average. It does the hon. Gentleman no credit to repeat such a scare story.

Mr. Clapham: I raised that statistic in the context of liabilities for common law damages. The article in The Guardian said that, by the end of the century, probably 200 people per year would have a common law claim against the nuclear industry. Therefore, I ask whether there is a no-fault scheme. How do the Government intend to replace that scheme? If we are talking about an average of £20,000 per claim, that amounts to a big liability of about £4 million per year. If that is the case, the information should have been in the prospectus.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman is stating, at least implicitly, that cancer is caused by working in the nuclear industry. There is no evidence that that is so. Whatever other debates we may have about the nuclear industry, it does no one any good to promulgate such a scare story.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West referred to statements by my noble Friend Lord Wakeham in November 1989. It is quite true: we decided at that time that it was not in the taxpayers' interest to sell the nuclear industry. It is a great credit to the management and the employees—including the trade unions—in the nuclear industry that they improved the efficiency and the productivity of that industry so that it can now be privatised, with good returns for the taxpayer and benefits for those same employees.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Eggar: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He has not been present during the debate except at the very beginning.

Mr. Wilson rose—

Mr. Eggar: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman did not sit through the debate.

[Mr. Eggar]

I must repeat again that liabilities have followed assets in the proposals for the sale of British Energy. We have made it clear in the past that that will happen, and I repeat quite categorically and unreservedly that liabilities will follow assets and that British Energy is responsible and will remain responsible for the liabilities that are associated with its stations.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and the hon. Member for Leeds, West made two particular criticisms. They accused the Government of setting the dividend at too high a level and, almost in the same breath, criticised us for selling British Energy too cheaply. New Labour claims to be the friend of industry and, like the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North–East, to have learned how financial markets work. It has, however, failed to grasp a very simple point. All other things being equal, a higher dividend being paid by the company increases its value, and in contradistinction, a lower dividend decreases its value. That simple fact means that the Government cannot at the same time be setting too high a dividend, which was one accusation, and simultaneously be selling the company too cheaply. Almost all companies are valued in relation to a multiple of the dividend that is being paid.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West simply does not understand the difference between profits in accounting terms and cash flow. It is up to the directors of the company to decide what they can afford to pay in dividends. As a general rule, from the taxpayers' point of view, the higher the dividend, the higher the proceeds that will be realised. The hon. Gentleman must understand that, by arguing for lower dividends, he is in effect arguing for lower proceeds for the taxpayer. He may not understand that, but it is an irrefutable fact, and it would be welcome if he admitted it.

When I first entered the House back in 1979, the Government owned the gas industry, the electricity industry, the coal industry and, in practice, much of the United Kingdom's rapidly expanding oil industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for North–West Surrey (Sir M. Grylls) said, in effect Ministers decided prices and made investment decisions. Those great utility industries were in practice cynically used as part of micro-economic decision taking by—one regrets to say—Governments of both major parties. As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade said, under Labour, that system gave us 2 per cent. increases in electricity prices on a six-weekly basis. As he also said, it meant that taxpayers paid £50 million a week in subsidies rather than receiving £55 million a week in taxes as they do now.

In practice, back in 1979, the Government decided what energy we should be provided with in our homes and what we should pay for it. That is all behind us. The sale of British Energy completes the privatisation of the energy sector. The benefits of that privatisation programme for customers are there for all to see. We in Britain have led the world in creating competitive energy markets. This privatisation shows that we are maintaining that lead.

The Opposition have opposed the privatisation of the nuclear industry, just as they have opposed every other privatisation. They said that electricity privatisation would mean that prices would rise. In practice and in fact, prices have fallen. They said that nuclear privatisation would saddle the taxpayer with huge liabilities and compromise safety. In fact, liabilities will follow assets into the private sector and everybody has made it clear that safety will continue to be paramount.

Privatisation is good for the company, for shareholders, for employees and for consumers, who will benefit from increased competition and from more downward pressure on prices. Privatisation is good for the taxpayer, who will benefit from significant proceeds and a substantial reduction in the cost of liabilities left in the public sector.

I ask the House to support the Government's amendment.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Timothy Wood and Mr. Simon Burns.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the publication of the Pathfinder prospectus for the sale of British Energy which confirms that the sale fulfils the Government's commitment to ensuring that liabilities follow assets into the private sector and is a good deal for the taxpayer who will benefit from equity proceeds, debt repayment and the permanent transfer to the private sector of responsibility for almost £4 billion of nuclear liabilities, for British Energy employees who will now have the opportunity to take a real stake in the future of their industry, for Magnox Electric which will be a robust public sector company capable of meeting its liabilities as they fall due; and further notes that the privatisation of British Energy serves the long term interests of the taxpayer, the industry, and consumers; and condemns the persistent attempts by the Opposition to undermine this and other privatisations.

Mr. R. Massey (Blight Compensation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

10.14 pm

Sir Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I have introduced this matter for consideration only after protracted correspondence between my constituent Mr. Massey and myself, and between myself and the Highways Agency and the Ministers responsible for roads and for local government. There has also been correspondence between Mr. Massey and a host of public servants. The failure to make any impact, stretching back well into 1994, necessitated my bringing the case to public attention.

The Higham Ferrers and Rushden A6 bypass was dreamed up before the war, was thought to have died and was forgotten, only to be resurrected in recent years—a welcome, if somewhat unexpected, resurrection. There was such little faith in it ever being built that, when my constituent Mr. Massey bought his house in Elizabeth way, Higham Ferrers, in 1970, he tells me that his solicitor did not bother to tell him that the road was a possibility. The local council built some bungalows for the retired, which will be well within 100 yd of the new road.

I do not want, however, to spend time arguing the road's merits. It is broadly welcomed as being needed, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London for his help in ensuring that it is to be part of the private finance initiative, and moves are being made to seek tenders. Like all such projects, however, some people have suffered. One of them is Mr. Massey.

There are three main concerns. The first is road blight generally. It has increased as a result of the slowdown in new road construction. Uncertainty as to if, as well as when, a project is to be built has grown. Secondly, the guidelines for discretionary purchase under section 246(2A) of the Highways Act 1980 have never been especially generous, but, as amended after the Owen case, they have become much less generous. The statutory and other preconditions seem to ensure that the minimum number of houses will be included in the scheme. Thirdly, as it stands in law, the assessment system for council tax purposes has no mechanism to reflect severe reductions in value resulting from road blight.

I will take those points in turn and relate them to Mr. Massey's case.

Road blight can have the most disastrous effects on an individual's finances. Mr. Massey says that, even with the general drop in market values, his house should be worth nearly £80,000 on independent estimates, but an agent puts its current value at £65,000. That is a serious matter for my constituent. There is no guarantee that he could sell even at £65,000 before the road is built, which, at best, is still two years or more away. Made redundant more than five years ago, he wished to sell his house to invest the capital in a new business. He is now in his 60s, but will receive no pension until he reaches the age of 65, so he has been living off his savings.

In the normal course of events, Mr. Massey could have sold his house, moved and invested, but the bypass plans, together with the legislation on discretionary purchase, have produced the present unfortunate position. Even if the date for building the road is fixed, his loss is established, as it will take property prices some time to recover. By then, Mr. Massey, like all of us, will be a few years older.

There is a need to assess possible purchase guidelines on a more sympathetic premise than currently exists. Mr. Massey's first application for his house to be bought met the condition regarding the closeness of the new road of less than 100 m from his home and the hardship criterion, and it was tacitly accepted that he also met the requirement of not being able to sell his property.

At that time, the one criterion that Mr. Massey did not quite meet was the estimated level of traffic noise by the year 2013, which was calculated at 63 dB to the human ear. The level set by the Highways Agency at which noise has a serious effect is 68 dB. The agency quotes 62.5 dB as the level at which communication starts becoming difficult, and 70 dB as reflecting the noise made by a passenger vehicle travelling at 60 km per hour at 7 m, yet Mr. Massey—like all of us—is supposed to accept a higher level in his home.

We are all aware of homes in which communication becomes difficult, but I never realised that it had to meet a standard set by the Department before compensation for road noise became applicable. It could provide an excuse for all sorts of silences in all kinds of families. Even a noise level of 63 dB is clearly an inconvenience.

Mr. Massey has pointed out in a number of letters that the estimated noise level is based on traffic flows and density 17 years ahead, in 2013. The Department's forecasting record is not encouraging. From my years on the Transport Select Committee, I know that previous forecasts by Ministers, before my hon. Friend began his tenure in office, have been dismally wrong—well on the low side.

The figure given for 2013 must be a guess, and is probably a poor one at that. The Department has admitted the possibility of a 20 per cent. error either way in some of its other traffic forecasts. In Mr. Massey's case, that would mean that he could suffer noise levels well above those estimated—even approaching that of a modern twin-engine jet—by the year 2013, which is so far away that such an estimate is realistic in view of Mr. Massey's present problems.

No wonder my constituent feels that the rules or guidelines are made to ensure the minimum number of purchases. My opinion is that the guidelines have been drawn too tightly. If one meets all the criteria, bar one that depends on an unprovable forecast, one does not qualify for purchase consideration. That seems extremely hard law.

It is obvious from all the communications that the Highways Agency has considerable sympathy with my constituent. In a letter dated 9 February 1995, the agency's Mr. Keith McKenzie wrote:

"I am sorry to have to give you a disappointing decision after so lengthy an exchange of correspondence. However, there is a slight possibility that this decision may be subject to review now that the Highways Agency's application for leave to appeal to the House of Lords in the Lt Col Owen case has been rejected. New guidelines are being prepared, but I am unable to say when they will be introduced, or exactly what they will contain. However, the main effect of the changes will be that the Highways Agency will need to take into account loss in value of the property attributable to a proposed scheme when assessing whether its enjoyment is seriously affected, and therefore whether it falls to be considered for discretionary blight. Your case will be reconsidered when the new guidelines are introduced."

A change was necessary—as quoted—because the Highways Agency lost its case against Colonel Owen of Gloucestershire.

What in fact happened? When the new guidelines were issued, there were some sweet-sounding phrases, such as "each application for discretionary purchase will be considered on its merits".

Further on in the document, after listing three major factors constituting "severe effects", it states:

"The factors listed in these guidelines are not exhaustive. Other factors or combination of factors may cause serious effects and this Agency will take these into account when considering your application".

The net result of the changes, however, was that they were not helpful. Instead of an applicant having to show that no offer for the property was received within 5 per cent. of the unaffected market value, as under the old guidelines, the figure was raised to 15 per cent. So much for the hints of a promise to Mr. Massey that a change might help him.

I believe that the whole basis of discretionary purchase needs to be re-examined. There seems to be a case for special consideration in cases of exceptional financial hardship, such as Mr. Massey's. Perhaps it should not be necessary to meet all the criteria to be considered for purchase.

As for council tax valuation, Mr. Massey's local council and the district valuation officer have been sympathetic, but say that they have no power to do anything. I realise that my hon. Friend the Minister is not responsible for this part of Government policy, but I hope that he will pass on my concerns to his colleagues at the Department of the Environment. It is bad enough to see the value of one's house falling because of market forces, but to see it fall much further because of road blight, to have no redress and still to have no chance of even a lower council tax valuation and banding only adds insult to injury.

I see my constituent's case as follows. He has been injured because he became redundant, because he is prevented from helping himself, and because of the operation of the law as it is now interpreted. The insult is that the Highways Agency gave him hope that the change in the guidelines might be beneficial. In fact, it made matters worse.

My constituent and those in a similar position deserve consideration. They deserve another look at the guidelines, and they deserve better.

I hope that I have shown that Mr. Massey has a real problem and a justified sense of injustice. My purpose in raising this matter is my belief that it illustrates a very real issue for very many people. Governments, whether local or national, take decisions—to build roads, to alter the lines of roads and to improve roads—which impinge greatly on the lives and finances of families.

To my mind, we have not yet shown, under any Government, the necessary concern or taken the necessary action to help many of those families. I believe that fact is a challenge for my hon. Friend the Minister and for his Department and its policy in the future.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Sir P. Fry) on securing this opportunity to discuss this case, which, as he rightly says, is of wider interest to many hon. Members, precisely because people such as Mr. Massey have been affected.

It is important to start by setting out the principles on which the Department will compensate those who are affected by schemes introduced by the Highways Agency. Similar arrangements exist for schemes introduced by local authorities, but it might be more appropriate to concentrate in this case on matters relevant to my Department.

The general principle, as my hon. Friend has rightly said, is that, where properties are required for a scheme and where the property falls within the line that the road scheme will take, the property will be acquired at value. A compulsory purchase order mechanism exists to ensure that a scheme can proceed once it has achieved the necessary powers. Clearly, there will be those who have properties which are not on the line of route but are adjacent to it, and that is what we are concerned about tonight.

Parliament quite properly recognised that there needed to be a system that would compensate such people for loss in value. However, I do not believe that it is unreasonable to accept the proposition that it will never be possible to compensate every owner whose property might be affected to a slight degree by a new scheme. Were we to attempt to do so, we would rapidly enter a world in which government would be wholly unworkable, and in which the cost of new pieces of infrastructure would be unaffordable.

The general principle is clear, and is contained in part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973. It establishes that, a year after a scheme is opened—a year after a road has been built—a property owner, subject to certain qualifications about being in residence and so on, who can establish that there has been a diminution in value will be compensated for that diminution.

In the direct context of Mr. Massey and the Higham Ferrers and Rushden bypass, let me make one thing clear. A year after the opening of the scheme, Mr. Massey would have an unequivocal right to compensation under part I of the Land Compensation Act.

If that is so, we turn to the proposition that, in addition to those powers, discretionary powers should be available to the Secretary of State. The circumstances about which we are concerned are those where, essentially, the individual cannot wait. I say that because I suspect that, quite frequently, the nature of discretionary purchase is not as well understood as it might be. I can understand why that is so, because emotions can run high in such matters.

If we are to have a scheme that advances the claim that Mr. Massey would be able to make under the Land Compensation Act, we need to establish certain things. First, we need to establish that Mr. Massey had no foreknowledge of the scheme when he purchased his property. Secondly, we need to prove that the scheme will have an effect, which it is not possible to determine exactly, because the road has not yet been built.

My hon. Friend talked about how one calculates the effect of noise. If he will allow me, I must tell him, gently, that I disagree with his view on that. Having established that there is a loss of value, a further test needs to be applied, and that is the test of a pressing need to sell. It is the pressing need to sell that ultimately determines that it is right in equity for Parliament and the Department to authorise the purchase of an individual's property in advance of the scheme even being built.

Let me deal with the calculation of loss of value. As my hon. Friend said, following the reassessment of the guidelines in the wake of the Owen judgment, two elements remain to be proven. One is the effect of noise on the scheme. He said that calculations that predict noise levels many years ahead may be inaccurate. I do not think that I do him any injustice by recalling that he said that they may be wildly inaccurate. That is true, but I remind him that the purpose of using a predictive, rather than an actual, calculation is twofold.

First, because the scheme has not been built, all calculations of noise level must necessarily be predictive. Secondly, it would be unfair to the occupier of a property to assess noise only at the point at which the scheme was first opened. A date many years in the future is picked precisely because traffic builds up over time.

Although I admit that such predictive science is inexact, I know that my hon. Friend, with his experience, will acknowledge that the officials who make such calculations do so as objectively as they are able. The test is good for the people concerned, because they get the benefit of the doubt in respect of the growth of traffic on a piece of road, even though it is unlikely to happen for many years.

In the case of Mr. Massey, much depends on the assessment both of noise and of diminution in value. On noise, I believe that there is no disagreement between Mr. Massey, his agent and the Department on the proposition that the predicted noise is unlikely to reach the levels that are generally considered to trigger the threshold for discretionary purchase.

On diminution in value, the position is more marginal. I can put some figures on the case that my hon. Friend made. The district valuer, whose opinion is the important one in such cases, assesses the unaffected value of Mr. Massey's property at £70,000, and the affected value at £60,000. He thus calculates a diminution in value of 14 per cent. While 14 per cent. is a material difference, it is less than the figure of 15 per cent. that my hon. Friend mentioned, which was in turn drawn from paragraph 3(a) of the new guidelines.

My hon. Friend said that 15 per cent. is rather higher than 5 per cent. He is right, but in calculating serious effect and diminution in value, it is necessary to establish that the diminution in value is significant. He will accept that, if one asks for a valuation from any three private valuers, there will be a margin of difference of about 10 per cent. That sort of fluctuation can be tested any day, in any town, anywhere.

So the figure of 15 per cent. is designed to indicate the figure at which there has been beyond doubt not merely a difference in valuation but an undoubted diminution in value arising from the prospect, if not the reality, of a scheme. That said, the difference in this particular case is 14 per cent. Taking account both of the fact that the noise calculations would appear to indicate that Mr. Massey's particular property will not suffer to the extent of the increase in noise normally taken into account in schemes such as this, and that the value of his property will not be diminished by more than 14 per cent. according to the district valuer's calculations, the Highways Agency has concluded that Mr. Massey's claim cannot be met. Let me be clear that it cannot be met on the grounds that he has not passed the tests of serious effect by way of noise or diminution in value.

I appreciate that the decision will come as a disappointment to Mr. Massey. I understand that he has suffered the loss of his job and that he seeks to use the proceeds of the sale of his property perhaps to re-establish himself in some business for the future. I am therefore concerned that my hon. Friend should be given every opportunity to prosecute his case.

Although I have not so far been made aware of any exceptional circumstances which would enable me to change my opinion in this case, if my hon. Friend believes that there are exceptional factors which have not been made known to the agency or to me or given adequate consideration, I invite my hon. Friend to write to me about them, and he and I will discuss the matter further.

I am, of course, concerned that, if it is agreed that the affected value of Mr. Massey's property should be £60,000 if he markets the property properly with a view to sale, he ought to be able to receive that figure. If, after he has properly marketed it, the indications are that he is not able to receive that sort of consideration, I should certainly wish to look at the case again.

I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for, as he rightly says, raising an extremely important subject, which is of interest to every Member of the House of Commons. I hope that he will accept that, having wrestled with such difficult cases for several years, I know that we will never be in a position to satisfy all those who feel aggrieved by the existence of a scheme—particularly one which, as he has every right to say, has a long history of not becoming a reality. Nothing is more frustrating.

In this case, I am satisfied that the guidelines have been properly applied, and, with regret, I concur with the officials, including Mr. McKenzie, who have been in touch with Mr. Massey. I fear that I cannot at this stage exercise discretion on his behalf. I simply underline the fact that, if circumstances prove not to be as predicted or assumed, I should be very happy to go on discussing the matter with my hon. Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

POINT OF ORDER

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I tabled two motions in the Table Office last night, about the North Wales police. Neither has appeared on the Order Paper this morning.

Madam Speaker: I am not aware of the activities of the hon. Lady last night in relation to the Table Office, but of course I will be glad to make inquiries to find out what it was all about.

Further Education (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

9.35 am

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I am grateful for the opportunity to introduce this debate on the very important matter of the funding of Scottish colleges of further education. Perhaps a better title for the debate would be "The underfunding of Scottish colleges of further education", because the underfunding is so serious that some colleges are rapidly approaching a crisis.

Many of the problems stem from 1993, when the Government removed Scottish colleges of further education from local education authority control. Before 1993, there was a strong element of local control and accountability, and local education authorities were able to take decisions to improve the funding of the further education colleges, taking into account local circumstances and priorities.

However, since incorporation was introduced in 1993, the 43 colleges have depended almost entirely on central Government instead of local government for funding. Since the financial year 1994-95, there has been a cut of grant in aid from £241 million to £230 million, with a further planned reduction to £211 million by the year 1998-99, making a total reduction at 1994-95 prices of £30 million or 12.5 per cent., yet there has been an increase of 23 per cent. in full-time equivalent student numbers since incorporation and an increase of 50 per cent. in students taking higher education courses in FE colleges. The Minister may tell us later that the revenue element for the current financial year increased compared with that for last year, but the extra revenue was funded by cutting the capital element.

Twenty-eight of the 43 colleges have suffered real cuts in income this year, and although the cut for any individual college has been limited to a maximum of 5 per cent.—about 8 per cent. after taking inflation into account—there is no guarantee that there will be such a limit next year. The consequences for many colleges have been very serious. Twelve colleges suffered the maximum cuts, including some of the largest colleges in Scotland, such as Bell, Dundee, Fife and Inverness, as well as some of the smaller colleges, such as Coatbridge and Thurso. Another victim of the maximum cut is the Jewel and Esk Valley college, which suffered such a bad cut last year that the management resorted to compulsory redundancies.

The underfunding has been exacerbated by the fact that Scottish Enterprise is also cutting its training budget, which in effect will reduce the income to colleges that participate in training schemes funded by local enterprise companies.

Responsibility for student bursaries has been transferred from local education authorities to the colleges, but despite the increasing number of students the total amount for bursaries has been frozen at £45 million a year for the next three years. As a result, many students will inevitably suffer considerable hardship.

It is ironic, too, that at a time when the number of students is increasing the number of staff in many colleges is decreasing. Last year saw the first ever compulsory redundancies, and more jobs are threatened if the underfunding continues. At Falkirk college in my constituency, the college authorities have apparently run out of volunteers opting for early retirement; and the Scottish Office pension scheme for early retirers is limited to employees over the age of 50. Since incorporation, more than 100 employees, including teaching and support staff, have left Falkirk college. The financial restrictions imposed by the Government also have a limiting effect on salary negotiations. That in turn has an adverse effect on staff morale.

Education is not, however, simply a job for teachers and lecturers. Teachers' jobs are very important, of course, but what is even more important is the valuable service that teachers provide by improving the educational, training and job opportunities of students—including the 200,000 students who attend Scottish colleges of further education. If there is a significant reduction in the number of teachers, that could lead to larger class sizes, and it could have an adverse effect on the quality of education.

There is also a danger of some entire courses being discontinued, and even of the scrapping of whole areas of the curriculum. Specialist courses will be available in fewer colleges, so students will be obliged to travel further and colleges may feel obliged to drop courses whose cost per student is relatively high—for instance, in construction and engineering.

The Government have also frozen the intakes to higher education courses in FE colleges and have stopped the introduction of new higher national certificate, higher national diploma and degree courses. Yet Ministers tell us that they agree about the need to increase the number of people who are educated and vocationally trained to high standards.

This country does not compare well with our major industrial competitors in the proportion of our work force with full craft and technician qualifications. The FE colleges have a key role in providing such qualifications, which are essential to our economic and industrial regeneration. It therefore does not make economic sense to deprive the colleges of the resources to do the job.

[Mr. Dennis Canavan]

The cuts also affect buildings maintenance and equipment, and students will find it difficult to reach their full potential if they are in oversized classes, in overcrowded classrooms or ill-equipped workshops. Later, the Minister may refer to the private finance initiative, but the PFI will not be enough to renew or replace dilapidated buildings or obsolete equipment; and some colleges may be forced to cut recurrent expenditure in order to fund essential capital projects.

The reason for the crisis facing many colleges is not just the inadequacy of the total grant in aid from the Scottish Office. There are also allegations about the unfairness of the formula used to allocate to each college its share of the grant. The total grant is divided up according to SUMs, or student units of measurement, generated by each college in the previous financial year. A SUM is defined as 40 hours of teaching delivered to a student.

Although some other factors are also taken into account, there is considerable concern that the formula does not take sufficient account of the diversity of the 43 college system. Some colleges are large, others are small. Some are in urban areas, others in small towns or rural areas. Some are polytechnics, others are virtually monotechnics. Some may have stronger community links than others.

The larger colleges complain that all 43 colleges receive the same amount of "institutional factor", irrespective of size. The institutional factor currently amounts to about £250,000 a year, which can be as much as 10 per cent. of the budget of a small college, compared with only 2 per cent. of the budget of a large one. The polytechnics complain that the formula discriminates against them because they have a greater proportion of higher education courses—for example, higher national certificate courses—which are more expensive to operate but which attract less money than further education courses under the existing formula. Yet the skills gap in this country is mainly at HNC or SVQ III and IV levels, which—ironically—are the worst funded courses in Scottish FE colleges.

The formula also discriminates against colleges in areas with low potential for assistance from the European social fund or the European regional development fund. This could amount to a difference of as much as £1 million a year between the amounts of help available for colleges of similar size.

There are also complaints about the fact that the funding is based on past student numbers, thereby limiting the opportunity to fund future developments, especially if high capital investment is required for new proposals. Such projects at Falkirk college would include biotechnology, food technology, petrochemical plant and mechatronics. The college management has set the laudable objective of becoming mid-Scotland's polytechnic by the year 2000, but Government underfunding will make it more difficult to achieve that objective.

The volatile operation of the funding formula has also been criticised. It tends to produce some large annual variations in the budgets of some colleges, so that it is quite possible for a college to make people redundant one year and take on additional staff the following year. Obviously, that does not help with continuity or planning. Such volatility could be alleviated if the funding formula were based on the numbers of full-time equivalent students—a methodology already used by the higher education funding councils. If the core funding for each college were supplemented by development funding, that would also help with planning.

Moreover, the Government should stop the capping of higher education in those colleges, and should end the unfair anomaly that higher education courses in FE colleges attract less funding than further education courses. The funding of higher education courses should be the same in the FE colleges as in the universities, and the Government should look at the possibility of making the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council responsible for the funding of all higher education in Scotland, both in universities and in colleges of further education.

Finally, the Government should give further consideration to strengthening the links between colleges and local education authorities by decentralising the funding process. I realise the Government's unwillingness to turn back the clock, but perhaps some contractual arrangement between the colleges and the local education authorities for the funding of further education courses would enable the different characters of the colleges to be recognised and would enable the colleges to retain the benefits of incorporation while giving them an element of local control and accountability.

In any event, the Government must give urgent consideration to the serious problem of underfunding of the colleges. The further education colleges have made an important contribution to increasing the participation of people in education, particularly young people. By 1998, the total number of 17 and 18-year-olds will have increased by 12 per cent. since 1995. The Government have set a key target for 2000—that 70 per cent. of young people will have at least an SVQ III qualification. However, last year only 51 per cent. of young people had that qualification—19 per cent. short of the target—and last year's figure was lower than that for 1993. The colleges have an important role in meeting the key targets for 2000.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): The hon. Gentleman referred to young people in our colleges. Does he accept that further education colleges also have a significant role for women whose families have grown up and who wish to return to college to undertake courses? One of the difficulties that these women face is that some of the colleges charge for creche and nursery facilities. This aspect should be looked at in depth. Women should be encouraged back into employment.

Mr. Canavan: I agree with the hon. Lady. Many of the courses that appeal to women may be discontinued if the Government do not provide adequate funding, which will severely limit education opportunities for many women throughout Scotland.

The colleges have traditionally played an important part in Scottish life, enabling many people to continue their education—whether it be for their individual development and enlightenment or for the acquisition of the types of vocational qualifications that are so essential for industry, commerce and the economy. If the colleges are to continue their excellent work, they must be given sufficient resources.

The Government must face up to their responsibilities. They introduced incorporation, so they can no longer pass the buck to local education authorities. The Government must provide the resources now. More expenditure on the colleges should be a top priority: it is an investment in education, an investment in training, an investment in people, and therefore an investment in Scotland's future.

9.53 am

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): Good morning, Madam Speaker. I congratulate my learned Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on securing this important debate and on covering it so eloquently. He has left little for other hon. Members to say, other than to mention important issues that concern the colleges that he did not mention, such as Kilmarnock college.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is there a precedent for a colleague saying good morning to you?

Madam Speaker: No, I do not think that there is. In four and a half years, I do not think that anyone has ever said good morning or good afternoon to me—which is why I appreciated it this morning, after a rather late night.

Mr. McKelvey: Madam Speaker, the point that you raise is valid: late nights and early mornings sometimes mean that we lose our sparkle.

Kilmarnock college is in my thoughts at the present time because of the Government's proposal to decrease the overall amount of funding for further education over the next two years. The proposal flies in the face of the success of all the colleges that have been mentioned, such as Kilmarnock college which is in my constituency. Evidence from Government reports has identified the need for a well trained and well educated work force, particularly at technician level in industries such as electronics, textiles, food and drink, and engineering.

All those industries are well represented in Ayrshire, particularly in Kilmarnock. In fact, the area used to be even better represented by these industries, before the loss of Massey Ferguson and almost 1,800 jobs at the stroke of a pen. That was some time ago. No multinational company of that size ever came back to Kilmarnock or to many other areas of Scotland. However, the small firms have done extremely well and we hope that their success continues.

Kilmarnock college has an effective working relationship with Enterprise Ayrshire and local authorities to deliver innovative training schemes. Kilmarnock college is working with small and medium-sized engineering companies, offering work-based training in a flexible, multi-skilling project. One has to ask why—at a time when ambitious national training targets have been set—are the Government squeezing the very organisations that are making the greatest contribution to achieving their targets?

Why are the Government reducing funding to further education colleges when, at the same time, they are producing competitiveness documents that indicate the need for Scotland to have a well trained work force to compete in European and international markets? Electronics, textiles and engineering are the industries in which we need to have a highly skilled and well qualified work force. These industries are already in Ayrshire, but why have the Government reduced the amount of money available to further education when an increase is needed?

At the same time, I see no logic in allowing colleges to expand their full-time provision at higher national certificate and higher national diploma levels in areas where there is a proven need for engineering, science and technology. The Scottish Office further education funding unit should be working much closer with colleges to allow growth in areas that are vital to our local economies, particularly in engineering and electronics. They are holding at current levels the courses in soft areas, such as arts and social science. I am not a critic of holding the places in those so-called soft areas.

I am concerned that further education colleges do not have the necessary modern buildings and equipment to provide the appropriate courses to meet local needs. Some of the buildings are modern, but they have proved to be totally inadequate for the Scottish climate, particularly those that have flat roofs. Kilmarnock college has to spend some £500,000 on roof repairs at its Kilmarnock campus and some £250,000 on roof repairs at its Irvine campus.

I would have expected the college to receive a generous capital allocation from the further education funding unit so that it could tackle the problems. There is no point taking people into a building if the roof is likely to fall in at any time. Roofing repairs cannot be put off until next year so far as capital expenditure is concerned—they have to be done now. What did the further education funding unit give Kilmarnock college to tackle this pressing problem? Nothing.

It is also important that colleges are able to purchase modern equipment that allows relevant and appropriate training to take place. In engineering, computer-aided design and manufacturing equipment, electronics equipment and science equipment are essential if we are to keep up the struggle with the competition in Europe and beyond. Electronic equipment and science equipment are vital, and my learned Friend the Member for Falkirk, West covered those points very well. However, they are worth underlining and I want to hear what excuse the Minister will give for not providing the funding necessary to purchase that equipment.

Unlike the higher education sector—universities have diverse sources of funding—further education colleges struggle to provide such equipment. As I have said, the Scottish Office allocation to Kilmarnock college this year is zero. How long can that be allowed to continue? It must not continue and I hope that the Minister will announce today if not a solution to the whole problem, at least some capital funding that will enable Kilmarnock college to begin to repair its roofing.

Like us, the Government must recognise the importance of further education to the economic and social well-being of our local economies and our communities such as Kilmarnock and Loudoun and other areas of Ayrshire and supply adequate funding so that colleges, including Kilmarnock college, can provide adequate further education within the terms of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Act 1992. The Act states that the Secretary of State has a duty to make adequate further education available throughout Scotland and I think that he and the Minister are in danger of defaulting on their duty in that regard. The Secretary of State is also in danger of failing in his duty to the people of Kilmarnock, of Ayrshire and of Scotland as a whole. I look forward to hearing the Minister confirm today that not only is he seriously concerned about the issues that hon. Members will outline but that he has immediate plans to reverse the trend.

10.1 am

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on his choice of subject for debate. While there has been considerable concentration on nursery, primary and secondary education due to the Government's interference and bungling in those areas and upon university education due to massive under-resourcing, the further education sector has been left out of the limelight. This debate gives credit where it is due. I know from my time as a senior lecturer at Angus college and at Dundee college the massive value of further education and the range of subjects that are taught at FE level.

Further education colleges have always been at the innovative and the pioneering edge of the education system. The hallmarks and the strengths of the FE sector are flexible courses, staff who are willing to adapt and reflect changing needs and the ability to cope with a wide range of demands for different courses—from the practical to the out-and-out academic. I enjoyed teaching in further education and I witnessed at first hand a period of growth at Angus and Dundee colleges which showed the FE system in its best light.

More than 200,000 students participate in either full-time or part-time further education—an increase of more than 50 per cent. since 1993. There is certainly a demand for further education. It has always been particularly important in the Scottish context as a provider of education and employment. According to the McNicholl report, further education colleges generated an estimated £600 million and 19,000 full-time equivalent jobs for the Scottish economy in 1993-94. They sustain many Scottish communities as both employers and education providers. I believe that we should invest in the sector—greater investment will be repaid handsomely in the future.

Under Government policy, which has consistently attacked local authorities, the right to award bursaries has been removed and the colleges are now funded directly by the Secretary of State for Scotland. The move to a new funding methodology was established through the use of a formula which directly links the level of funding to the volume and quality of learning. The key criteria in formula funding are student recruitment and retention. It represents an abrupt change from historic funding and has caused major difficulties for individual colleges.

While grant allocations are based entirely on the number of students at respective colleges, the Government have sought to encourage the growth of private finance initiatives. I believe that the loss of control associated with the development of PFIs undermines accountability. The Government have cut capital grants assuming that PFIs will step in, but the lack of proper investment has hit developments in science, engineering and technology. I am told that there are no funds to prepare for and implement "Higher Still" in 1998. I hope that the Minister will address those problems directly.

Some £11 million was axed from the Government's previous funding plans for further education colleges in 1995, despite a projected increase of 12 per cent. in the number of young people aged 17 and 18 in the period 1995-98. Thus the success of further education colleges is leading to their being penalised. The cuts also ignored the fact that the Government are already under-performing in terms of their training targets.

The effect of the cuts has been twofold. First, the need to make savings has caused huge staffing problems. The hon. Gentleman underlined that point admirably when he pointed out that Falkirk college of technology was forced to save £670,000, which is equivalent to 35 jobs. Lecturers at Coatbridge college have not had a salary increase since April 1994, which led to a strike by Educational Institute of Scotland members.

Secondly, there has been an attack on the national character of further education colleges, as increased funding for one college reduces funding for another. Simple numbers of students is a crude means of evaluation, which ignores special needs and the importance of the continued existence of a diverse choice of colleges at a time when increasing numbers should be a prime objective. FE colleges contribute greatly to the Scottish economy and we should build on that strength.

The Association of Scottish Colleges has offered some possible solutions to the problem and I recommend its suggestions to the Minister. They include an increase in the overall recurrent grant, a relaxation of capping, stronger policy support for vocational training, support to implement "Higher Still" in 1998 and more capital funds to bring buildings and equipment up to modern standards. Instead of greater investment, the Government propose further cuts in resources.

I note with despair that grant aid to colleges will be reduced by £15 million in the next three years—a cumulative reduction of 12.5 per cent. Those cuts are not sustainable without hefty redundancies of staff and a loss of quality and/or range of teaching—which is the strength of the FE sector. The PFI certainly cannot renew or replace dilapidated buildings or obsolete equipment. There is a danger that funds for bursaries in vocational further education will be frozen and that there will be a shortfall in key training targets.

The Government are failing the further education sector which would amply repay the extra investment that it needs. I have worked in further education and I know its strengths and the immense benefits that it offers across society. I echo the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing): some of the best students I taught were women with families who returned to education. Many of them went on to university and they now have degrees. They are a credit to the further education sector, and their progress should be developed rather than hindered by a lack of investment.

Young people relish the further education atmosphere. Mature students who are given a second chance at education are faced with a dazzling range of courses that meet the needs of individuals and industry. I believe that further education is an asset that the Government are failing to resource properly. In so doing, they are making a major mistake.

10.8 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I say amen to the considered, well argued and well informed speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), who knows and cares a great deal about the issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) and the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) also made important speeches and raised many issues which deserve answers. I hope that the House will forgive me if I stick to a wholly local issue: the proposed relocation of West Lothian college to Livingston.

I am not casting aspersions on the motives of those who have made the proposal. I do not doubt their good faith and I understand perfectly well the attractions of a college under one roof on a single site rather than the difficulties that inevitably arise with an institution based on two separate sites, although it may not be such a serious problem to have two sites for a further education college which, by its very nature, would be concerned with full-time learning rather than part-time courses. But any such move would tear the heart out of the proud town of Bathgate.

Those of us in the area of Bathgate have accepted that the police headquarters, the council headquarters and a number of other important institutions should move to the new town, but at some point we must ask questions about the centres of old boroughs. The Minister should take it from me, as the local Member of Parliament and a local person, that the removal of that college from Bathgate would be a serious matter for the town and for that part of West Lothian. I therefore have five questions to ask.

First, what are the responsibilities of the board of management of the college to the Scottish Office? Perhaps I should know, but I am not the only one who is not clear about that. Secondly, the proposal has leaked out, but has the Scottish Office been consulted—it may not have been—and, if so, what did it say? Thirdly, what has the Scottish Office advised about staff and resource requirements? As my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West has said, there is a desperate shortage of resources and so many other urgent priorities. Has the Scottish Office been consulted about the proposal as a priority for the use of scarce resources and, again, what has it advised?

Fourthly, what consideration has been given to the proposal by planners in the Scottish Office? West Lothian council has not been consulted about the rebuilding—if there is to be rebuilding—or new building on the St. Mary academy site and on the land above the college which, as far as we know, is free land on which major building work could take place. Has consultation taken place about that proposal?

Fifthly, as I understand the current proposals—I am open to correction—the builders are to erect a new building on the Livingston site. In return, West Lothian college proposes to give—I repeat, give—the current buildings and land to the builders, though not the old academy, which I believe is listed, because it belongs to the people of Bathgate. We are uncertain about who the people of Bathgate are in that respect, other than the successors to the old West Lothian county council. That is a grey area. As I understand it, West Lothian college will then lease—I repeat, lease—the new building and equipment from the builders. If I have understood it right, and if other people have understood it right, that arrangement raises a few eyebrows. What does the Scottish Office think about the leasing proposal?

The issue is the future of the town of Bathgate. I ask those questions, in gentle tones, because I genuinely do not know the answers. I do not want to jump to any conclusions until there has been a proper discussion.

10.14 am

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I wish to add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on obtaining this debate on the subject of further education. The subject has been much neglected in debate in the House and it is high time that further education, especially Scottish further education, got a thorough airing. My hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) spoke about equipment and facilities for people undertaking skills training and I fully support all that he said.

I wish to raise an aspect of further education that has always been neglected—the wider general education of students in further education. Everyone who has ever worked in further education knows, as the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) will confirm, that there is not only a long-standing lack of appropriate funding, but sometimes a problem, unfortunately, with the attitudes of the traditional craft teachers, who regarded any time spent on general education as a waste of students' time. It has always been a struggle to provide appropriate general education for students who come straight from school and spend some years on day release or block release.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West mentioned the fact that teacher numbers in FE were dropping, he filled me with alarm. I taught in FE for some years and I remember what happens when there are not enough teachers to serve the students' needs. Teachers get landed with timetables that have far too many class contact hours and they cannot get through timetables of that size without using devices to overcome the problems, such as doubling up classes; that is not good for the students, but it is one of the strategies that teachers are forced to adopt when they have marking or preparation to do for other classes.

Teachers are also asked to teach subjects that they are not qualified to teach. I recall my first week in FE. I had spent several years acquiring an honours degree in economic history, with English as my second subject, but I was given a timetable that included four periods of chemistry. I went to the head of department and said that there must have been a mistake. He said that the students were only studying chemistry at a low level and that I need be only one chapter ahead of them. I refused point blank to teach chemistry because I had not spent all those years acquiring my qualifications to end up teaching a subject that I could have taught equally badly when I left school. I failed science in my third year at school and never attempted it again.

It is nonsense that teachers can be asked to teach subjects that they are not qualified in, but it happens. I was able to resist the request because I was in a full-time, permanent post and I had a union that could back me up if necessary. But now, when so many people have short-term, impermanent posts and contracts, they find it difficult to resist such nonsensical suggestions.

[Mrs. Maria Fyfe]

Such problems will lead to a failure to educate young people in further education so well as they could be educated.

Another problem is the discontinuation of courses because there are not enough staff to teach them. Another danger, which has not yet been mentioned, is the requirement that a course must have a certain number of bodies in the classroom to be taught. If a small number of students genuinely want to do a course and are appropriately qualified for it and keen to get started, they might be disappointed unless the number of bums on seats can be increased.

What happens is that people for whom that course is not really appropriate are persuaded by unscrupulous persons to enter that course, which might not be right for them because it is either beyond or beneath their capacities. It might not be a suitable subject area for them. In some instances students will be directed to the course merely to get it started. If they later fall by the wayside, too bad. Some will say, "At least the course was started." We must avoid such nonsense taking place in further education. We know, of course, that they arise because of shortage of funds.

I should like to know—the Minister will probably not be able to tell me when he replies, but the information could be set out in a written answer—what is spent per head on further education and higher education students. We know that HE necessarily costs a great deal of money. We have seen the results of underfunding in FE, however, which can be grotesque. I spent several years in a business studies college, which was virtually asked by the local authority not to use so much paper. That was a nonsensical request of a business studies college. We were not making paper aeroplanes. Paper was being used for work.

Anyone who has taught general education in an FE college will recognise the Wilt syndrome. Tom Sharpe wrote about the experience of a general studies teacher staggering from block A to block D with 20 copies of "Shane" in his arms. Tom Sharpe was not exaggerating and he was not joking. Students do not have the funds to enable them to buy their own books. I remember ancient and battered copies of texts that we had to cart from room to room, or even block to block, so that we might give work to students. We had constantly to spend time devising our own materials or finding them because there were insufficient funds. That time could have been spent on teaching. Those are examples of what happens when there is underfunding in further education.

The market has been brought into further education and, as a result, colleges are competing with one another for courses instead of adopting a more sensible planning approach to ensure that colleges play to their own strengths and teach the subjects which are traditional to them and which they are accustomed to teach. A planning approach would ensure that students' needs were better met than at present. Students now are even more disadvantaged than they were 20 years ago when I was involved in FE.

I look forward to the day when we have a Scottish Parliament. At long last we shall have a dedicated and elected body that will take the interest in FE that is now sadly lacking.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I shall speak only briefly because the debate takes place on the firm foundation provided by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), who covered almost all the ground. It was tempting to say, "Let the Minister reply to that." The hon. Gentleman made all the key points.

I take up the final remark of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe). I, too, look forward to the day when there is a Scottish Parliament. If it works as those who are involved in the constitutional convention foresee, it will use committees and have a greater involvement in consultation. As a result, the further education and higher education institutions will have a close link with the Scottish Parliament. When it makes decisions that affect FE and HE, and other education sectors, they will be informed ones. I have no doubt that it will legislate accordingly. There will be good and close links between the Scottish Parliament and those involved in the various education sectors.

When the Government took legislation through the House to take FE colleges away from local authority control, the proposal was met with considerable resistance, and naturally so. There is considerable concern when Government have the opportunity to centralise. They follow up that process with direct controls over funding, which is really the substance of the debate.

In a local context, I appreciated the fact that the Scottish Office gave proper recognition to the fact that the FE colleges in both Orkney and Shetland were closely integrated with the secondary schools on both islands. Since structural changes have taken place, it has been pleasing to watch the development of FE facilities on both Orkney and Shetland. I had the great pleasure last year of opening some splendid new facilities for the FE college on Shetland. I know that on Orkney considerable efforts are being made to establish the FE college in its own right. I believe that we shall see it moving away from its integration with the secondary school.

What we have achieved locally on the islands echoes one of the calls made by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West. There should be a way of establishing better links with the local education authority and FE colleges. It is important to establish a link between the community and its FE college. That is something that we have achieved on Orkney and Shetland because of our slightly different status.

It is important to develop—I am sure that this is not exclusive to FE colleges in the highlands and islands—distance learning techniques. A considerable amount of education is now delivered by that means, and I am sure that the technique will be developed still further in years to come. Many FE colleges will play an important part in the development of the university of the highlands and islands. It is thought that the university should not be concentrated in one place and instead should be a multi-campus institution. I am sure that FE colleges have a considerable and important role to play in that context.

We have heard that, since the incorporation of FE colleges, there have been considerable achievements in terms of increasing numbers of students and efficiency gains, which last year were assessed as 4.2 per cent. As has been said this morning, however, we cannot go on and on increasing numbers and expecting efficiency gains to be achieved. Increasing numbers pose their own problems in terms of providing accommodation and ensuring that proper staff time is made available to students.

The cry that is coming from the debate is that it must be recognised that we cannot continue to reduce funding year upon year. There is a predicted reduction in funding of about 4 per cent. in real terms, year on year, from now until 1998-99. That will lead to a reduction in the quality of the education provided, and it is bound to have an effect on staff morale, especially if there are redundancies to meet lower budgets. Reduced funding will also have an effect on students.

Those engaged in FE, and the nation as a whole, face a considerable challenge. It is clear that FE is an important resource and an important opportunity for the 60 per cent. of young people who do not wish to enter HE. It is an important sector in which the skills of our young people can be developed. When we consider the targets that have been set by the Government and the Advisory Scottish Council for Education and Training, we realise how far we are still falling behind. One of the most alarming targets is that 60 per cent. of the work force should have SVQ III qualifications by the year 2000. We had reached 47 per cent. by 1995, and the position was static. Given the trends that have been discussed this morning, it is difficult to see how the gap can be bridged satisfactorily in the four years left to do it.

Everyone—the Government and the Opposition, the Confederation of British Industry and the Scottish Trades Union Council—agree that it is important to improve the skills and training of our young people. As the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) rightly reminded us, it is not only young people and women returners who are to be considered. We must increasingly recognise that in a rapidly changing world the skills that young people acquire at the age of 18 or 19 may not be the skills that they need for employment or employability when they reach the age of 35 or 40. We shall increasingly see people returning to colleges to update their skills, and the FE colleges in Scotland will have a significant role to play.

We must maintain a network of FE colleges which achieve high standards. That can be done only if it is accepted that there must be the funding and resources that go with producing the quality education that our country and especially our young people so desperately need.

10.29 am

Mrs. Helen Liddell (Monklands, East): I join my hon. Friends in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on securing this important debate, as further education has become very much the orphan of the education system, which is regrettable, as it is a tremendous window of opportunity for people and, indeed, the economy.

I hope that such an experienced parliamentarian as my hon. Friend will not consider it amiss if I—as an inexperienced parliamentarian—echo the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and pay tribute to the considered nature of my hon. Friend's speech, much of which was obviously the result of considerable thought and experience. I listened to it with interest and will read it tomorrow with even greater interest, as he gave us some pointers to the future that merit detailed consideration by my hon. Friends and me, and also by the Government. Many of my hon. Friend's points about the future of higher education funding and the relationship with further education funding are important. The key point he made is at the root of the debate—the paucity of funding for further education in Scotland, which is of considerable importance to Scotland.

Since taking over the education brief, I have had lengthy discussions with representatives from further education colleges. Indeed, I have a constituency interest, as a further education college is adjacent to my constituency. In the House today are representatives of the further education colleges, who have travelled all the way from Scotland at considerable inconvenience and expense, so it is with regret that I see that on the Government Benches the Minister sits isolated with only the Whip for interest. Do none of his hon. Friends represent areas with an interest in further education? Further education is at the heart of the education system in Scotland, and it is regrettable that Conservative Members have not taken more interest in the debate, given that all the Opposition parties in Scotland have been represented and a number of significant points have been made.

The extent of the funding cut affecting colleges—half the colleges have suffered quite a severe cut—is causing grave concern to all of us who are concerned about the future of further education in Scotland. The point has been made repeatedly that there has been a continuing quest for efficiency on the part of the Government, not recognising that year-on-year quests for efficiency, with student numbers increasing, as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) pointed out, are not the route to efficiency but are the route to reducing quality. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe). I shudder to think what I would have done if I had been asked to teach chemistry. I referred in Committee yesterday to the lengths to which I went to get a higher in Latin, which involved learning Latin off by heart to get through the exam. I should add that I was successful and now have a higher in Latin, but do not ask me to translate any of it.

This is the European Year of Lifelong Learning, and the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), in his capacity as Scotland's Education Minister, took part in its impressive launch at the new conference centre in Edinburgh just few months ago, in the presence of Mrs. Edith Cresson. Is it not ironic therefore that this year we are cutting the resources to one of the key elements of lifelong learning—further education?

My hon. Friends and the Minister will recognise that I have a specific interest in this in relation to the career of my personal assistant, Mr. Frank Roy, who was a Ravenscraig shop steward and was made redundant as a consequence of the closure of that plant. The closure had a devastating effect on the economy not just of Lanarkshire but of all Scotland. With the help of Motherwell college, he got his highers, and with his own determination he got a degree from Glasgow Caledonian university. He now works for me, which is a bit of a dip in his prospects, but in the next few months my hon. Friends and I look forward to welcoming him to the Labour Benches as the Member of Parliament for Motherwell and Wishart. [Interruption.]

[Mrs. Helen Liddell]

I have a limited sense of direction, but I am sure that my hon. Friend, as he will be at that time, will be a great help to a Labour Government, given his wide range of skills and his common sense. Common sense is lacking in the Government's attitude to further education in Scotland. It is common sense to build up the skills base of our economy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) pointed out, what is the point of competitiveness White Papers when we are slipping to 35th place in the world list of educational qualifications? We are cutting the very means by which people can acquire skills throughout their career.

Those of us who are in our prime left school, but the opportunity was there to pursue further or higher education and to look forward to a reasonable spread of careers, until the Conservative Government took over in 1979. Now our children will probably have to change careers three or four times in their working lives, not just as a consequence of the policies of the Conservative party Government but because of industrial and technological change. One key way to ensure change in the skills base is through an adequate system of further education. My party pledges itself to a strong and vibrant further education sector.

I have taken on board a number of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West, which are extremely interesting. I have also taken into account one of the significant points made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland regarding asset targets. We recognise that, if we are to have a viable economy in future, we must increase the skills base. I pay tribute to the work carried out by the advisory committee on education and training in Scotland, which has done a tremendous amount of work in identifying the weaknesses in the skills base.

I was particularly impressed with some of the points made by the Association of Scottish Colleges, which I had hoped to meet on Monday. Because of parliamentary business at the Scottish Grand Committee in Perth, however, I was not able to do so. That association and the Educational Institute of Scotland pointed to the shortfall in meeting the asset targets in Scotland. To an extent, that is because Ministers refuse to accept ownership for the targets and refuse to accept responsibility for the funding of further education to ensure that we meet them.

In another part of the House, we have discussed in the past few weeks the establishment of a single examination board that will take into account the Scottish Examination Board and the Scottish Vocational Education Council to ensure that the examination structure in place for the introduction of "Higher Still", which is a radical change in post-16 education in Scotland. One important element to secure changes in post-16 education in Scotland is to ensure that our further education colleges are equipped to prepare themselves for "Higher Still", and they are limited as a consequence of the decisions that the Government have taken on funding.

How many colleges began this year with a deficit? Further education colleges have been under pressure not just because of the impact of incorporation but because of the policies that the Government have adopted. One of the positive consequences of incorporation is the involvement of local businesses in further education. Many business men and women are appalled at the way in which the Government have conducted further education funding: they continually move the goalposts. They insist on efficiency savings whenever they are not prepared to make resources available, and they fail to recognise the crying need of local industry for a well-skilled work force.

I listened with great interest to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, who pointed out the difficulties that Bathgate is likely to experience as a consequence of the decision to centre his further education college in Livingston. I do not wish to go into specific constituency points, but my constituency is adjacent to Bathgate and I recognise the extent to which a college can give some vibrancy, life and hope to a community. My constituency is adjacent to Coatbridge college and I recognise the significance that it brings to the local community. I know from my local employers how important it is to have the college nearby, one with which they can co-operate and get a ready supply of skilled workers.

The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh), who has worked in further education, made an important point about the availability of resources. He also spoke of the need for a diverse range of courses. We in Scotland pride ourselves on the diversity of our education system, which must be extended and maintained in further education. The point was amplified by my hon. Friend the Member for Maryhill, who referred to her own experience and made an interesting point about the quest for improved general education standards in Scotland. That relates to the availability of general education in further education colleges for those pursuing craft courses.

If we are to have multi-skilling, and if new skills are to be available for the future, people must have the self-confidence that will enable them to change skills. That may not seem important, given the self-confidence of my hon. Friends, but increasing people's confidence is difficult in Scotland, partly because we have experienced generations of high unemployment. Our education system is very sound on the basics, which gives us the edge, but we lose out through not giving people enough self-confidence. That is one of the great things that educational qualifications can provide, because achievement in the further education sector is recognised.

It is regrettable that we have had to have this debate. It would have been much better if we had gathered here to examine the opportunities for further education in Scotland. As we approach the turn of the century, new industries and opportunities will emerge. I hope that that will happen under a Labour Government.

Those of us who represent Lanarkshire constituencies are very conscious of the impact of inward investment and companies such as Chunghwa Picture Tubes, and of the need to provide the diversity of skills that that company will require. The same position is replicated throughout Scotland. Another important part of Scotland's economic future is tourism. Many of our colleges provide courses in hospitality, which are vital to the improvement of the service that we offer the tourist industry. They, as well as the many science and technology-based courses of which we have been so proud in the past, are important in Scotland.

I cannot understand the reasoning of the Scottish Office. I hope that the Minister will be good enough to give us a clue to why he is selling not just the family silver but the future in refusing to fund our colleges adequately. It is not necessary to travel far to find colleges that are doing sterling work in deplorable conditions. There will be no sustainable future for those colleges if there are to be hefty staff redundancies, and a lessening of the quality and range of teaching because of the pressures put on teachers who must work in dilapidated buildings with obsolete equipment that the private finance initiative cannot renew or replace.

The only form of growth that has taken place is the granting of responsibility to colleges for the allocation of bursaries. We shall be discussing that elsewhere in the House of Commons in the next few days, but is it not ironic that the Government, while trimming and fiddling at the edges, are ducking the key issue? If we are to invest in the future of the Scottish economy and the confidence of our young people, and secure the place in the world economy which I believe we are capable of securing rather than languishing where the Government have put us, the investment that we make in education is crucial.

I commend the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West. He made valid points that summed up the issues that people in Scotland are currently discussing. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun pointed out, in investing in further education we are investing in training, education, our people and our country's future.

This morning's debate shows the nature of the issues that a Scottish parliament will address. It will be in tune with the demands of the people of Scotland, and will provide a degree of co-ordination and commitment that I consider important. I hope that the damage that the Government are doing to further education will not have dug in so deep that it will be too difficult for us to address in the early days of a Labour Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on securing the debate. It has been a good debate, and, although I may not have agreed with everything—indeed, anything—said by Opposition Members, I do not doubt their sincerity for a moment. That applies both to the specific constituency cases cited by the hon. Members for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) and for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and to the more general points that were made.

Mr. Canavan: Did I hear the Minister say that he did not agree with anything that had been said by Opposition Members?

Mr. Robertson: I did not agree with everything, and perhaps with anything, but the hon. Gentleman may agree with some of what I say. As I have said, I do not doubt Opposition Members' sincerity, although part of what was said by the hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) seemed unnecessarily strident.

The debate is important because of the vital role that our colleges play in meeting the skills needs of the Scottish economy. I hope that the hon. Member for Falkirk, West read the article in yesterday's edition of The Herald, which said that substantial growth in the uptake of Scottish vocational qualifications was being stimulated throughout Scotland by the further education sector. That flies in the face of one of the central points of the hon. Gentleman's speech.

No one disputes the fact that we need a highly competitive and skilled work force in an increasingly competitive global economy. The role of colleges, and their success—for I believe they are successful—is not mentioned often or loudly enough. Today's wide-ranging debate has highlighted some of those successes, but, unfortunately, it has also misrepresented the dynamism of Scotland's FE sector to a great extent. I welcome the opportunity to make clear the Government's support for the colleges, and to describe what we have done and will do in the future.

I am personally committed to that, having visited nine colleges in virtually as many months. I did that because I wanted to see at first hand what they were doing and how they were doing it. I was impressed by the enthusiasm and commitment of the management, staff and students whom I met, and I pay tribute to them.

In the period since April 1993—which, after all, was only just over three years ago—colleges have built on earlier strengths and, through that liberating process, have achieved some remarkable advances. Incorporation has assisted college responsiveness by devolving decision making to local level, and has led colleges to look critically at their structures and systems to ensure that they are appropriate to a dynamic environment.

The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun asked why a college in his constituency had received a nil capital allocation for this year. Capital works in our colleges are increasingly being funded successfully from the private finance initiative. What the hon. Gentleman did not mention was that Kilmarnock college had received 5.12 per cent. additional funding this year and last year had received a capital grant of more than £500,000. I was concerned by much of what the hon. Gentleman said, however, and I shall be happy for my officials to meet representatives of the college as a matter of urgency to see whether the issues that he raised can be explored further.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned the relocation of West Lothian college from Bathgate to Livingston. The college has not yet assessed the financial and other implications of the option to relocate the entire college. In reaching its conclusions, it will have regard to the best interests of education and training in the West Lothian area as a whole, and we shall study those conclusions carefully.

The hon. Gentleman asked five specific questions. If he does not mind, I shall reply to them fully in writing.

Mr. Dalyell: Obviously such a reply is much better than an immediate response, but will the Minister assure me that the officials will sit down with all concerned and discuss the position before any final decisions are made?

Mr. Robertson: I do not hesitate to give the hon. Gentleman that assurance.

As the hon. Member for Monklands, East said, colleges are also involving employers, as major stakeholders, in what they do. That involvement takes place at many levels: on the board of management to ensure strategic vision, with the local enterprise company to collaborate in the local achievement of education and training targets and with individual employers to meet their specific needs. What characterises the 220,000 students who attend colleges is the differences between them, and that is the strength of those colleges. About a third of college activities are undertaken by part-time students, with 5 per cent. of students studying by open or flexible learning. In recent years, much of the growth in Scottish higher education has occurred in colleges.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) spoke of staff numbers being in decline. That is not true. In October 1992, there were 6,850 teaching staff, but since incorporation the number has risen, to just under 7,000 in 1994-95. The increases in the volume of student activity in 1994-95 over the previous year were as follows: art and design, up 14 per cent.; social studies, languages and communication, up 9 per cent.; and special needs programmes, up 17 per cent.

Mrs. Fyfe: If the Minister cannot answer my question now, perhaps he will write to me, but what is the student to staff ratio now compared with five or 10 years ago?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Lady has asked a number of specific questions and I shall reply in writing.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister said that staff numbers have increased. Are his figures for full-time equivalent staff?

Mr. Robertson: Yes, they are.

Mrs. Fyfe: Will the Minister give a written answer on how many of those staff are in permanent posts and how many are on short-term contracts?

Mr. Robertson: I shall write to the hon. Lady. If she wants me to write to her again, perhaps she will write to me and we may make some progress.

We funded growth, but, following rapid expansion, it has proved necessary to hold full-time numbers to their current record levels, although colleges are being encouraged to continue to expand the number of students on part-time higher education courses.

Such provision is not capped. Just under half of all students are over 25, reflecting the range of innovative programmes on offer and the colleges' commitment to lifelong learning. Increasingly, colleges provide training for employers on their premises, often to Scottish vocational qualification standards. I want to encourage these trends, with colleges increasing student participation further, particularly by introducing more part-time provision and open and flexible learning opportunities in partnership with employers.

The goal of increasing student participation has been one of our major objectives since incorporation, and we are meeting the objective. In the academic year 1994-95, student activity increased by 6 per cent. Colleges will continue to increase activity this academic year and in future. That growth is being stimulated by the funding of colleges and by the way in which funds are distributed.

Listening to some hon. Members, one would think that colleges do not have the resources to fund that expansion. Since incorporation in April 1993, recurrent funding for further education has increased by 14 per cent. In each year, the recurrent funding made available to colleges has increased. In 1996-97, £233 million will be available. That has been possible despite the need to maintain downward pressure on public expenditure.

The hon. Member for Monklands, East, in a wide-ranging and well-crafted speech, said that the Government were underfunding further education. I assume that she missed out the page in her speech that stated by how much we are doing so and how quickly and how much an incoming Labour Government would put into Scottish higher education. I give her the chance to rectify her mistake, which she made when she turned over two pages in her speech instead of one.

Mrs. Liddell: I was aware that a number of colleagues had made the point and I did not wish to be unnecessarily repetitive. However, £45 million less is available to colleges than employers say they need simply to maintain 1995 service levels.

Mr. Robertson: No, it was not that page but the one that states how much a Labour Government would invest in their first year in office.

Mrs. Liddell: I recognise that the Minister is practising for being in opposition, questioning the next Government. We will adequately fund Scottish further education. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has published wide-ranging proposals that will ensure that our young people get the skills and training that the Government's funding of further education is limiting.

Mr. Robertson: I hope that all those from the colleges who are watching the debate and those who will read it later heard the hon. Lady refuse to give any commitment on how much an incoming Labour Government—that will not happen—will spend.

The challenge for now and for the future is to maintain and improve standards while increasing efficiency. We have set the colleges challenging targets, delivering efficiency savings of 4 per cent. each year. I am pleased to say that the colleges are achieving that, and there is no reason why they cannot continue to do so.

At the time of incorporation, the costs of providing further education varied enormously throughout Scotland. In some colleges, it cost about twice as much to teach comparable subjects. Colleges were not funded coherently or systematically. We have therefore gradually phased in a newer and fairer approach to allocating funds, based on student activity achieved by colleges. This aims to ensure that a reasonable balance is struck between resources that colleges receive from the taxpayer and the need to encourage them to deliver value-for-money increases in student participation and high standards, which they are achieving.

I make no apologies for the new funding formula, requiring high-cost colleges to find efficiencies to bring them closer to the average. The wide variation in colleges' cost efficiencies could not continue. We are assisting colleges to make the necessary adjustments by restructuring funds—£4 million in 1995-96—for retraining or enabling staff to take early retirement. This is not all about shedding staff; restructuring must reflect the changing pattern of demand for courses. Many colleges are recruiting staff to meet the changing and growing demand in new areas, as the hon. Member for Falkirk, West said, such as mechatronics.

Our decisions on college funding reflect our view that, increasingly, the private finance initiative will replace capital grant funding. It is an important policy in bringing together a new partnership between the private and public sectors. Despite Opposition Members' comments, colleges are enthusiastic about it.

Mr. Canavan: We do not doubt colleges' enthusiasm, but it would be greater if they received sufficient resources to do the job. The figures that I quoted were given to me by the Association of Scottish Colleges, which in turn were extracted from the Scottish Office's plans. Taking revenue and capital expenditure into account, in real terms, there will be a 12.5 per cent. reduction in the amount that the Scottish Office gives colleges from 1994-95 to the financial year 1998-99. How on earth can the Minister justify such a massive decrease in assistance to colleges?

Mr. Robertson: Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman has not been listening to me. I am glad that he accepts that colleges are enthusiastic about the private finance initiative.

Two projects—a new campus for Falkirk college in Stirling and a new campus for West Lothian college in Livingston—are at an advanced stage. The PFI is not the only public and private partnership that is under way. By operating more efficiently, colleges are freeing resources to improve their buildings and equipment, both directly and through the freedom to borrow. There are examples all over Scotland.

Among the best is the new multi-million-pound campus at James Watt college at the waterfront development in Greenock. Perth college has attracted £2 million of support from the Gannochy trust for a new library and study centre, which will put it at the forefront of the use of new technology.

I was pleased to inaugurate the construction of that building, where I announced a grant of £200,000 to assist with equipment. The policy document "Training for the Future" announced an allocation of £500,000 to equip colleges generally with new technological equipment. We have also invested substantially in upgrading college buildings since incorporation, with capital grants of £46 million. Hon. Members who visit colleges will see the transformation for themselves.

The list of achievements is long: the multi-million-pound project at Edinburgh's Telford college, whose refurbished north campus opened on Monday; Cardonald college, where investment of £4 million has been made; and Langside college's business school, which I recently opened.

If we are to face future challenges, a partnership approach is important. I should like briefly to identify what they will be. We must strive to provide better guidance, raise participation and improve success in achieving qualifications. We are working with colleges in these areas.

The "Higher Still" reforms, which will be implemented in academic session 1998-99, will provide a unified programme of academic and vocational learning, leading to certificates on a subject or group basis.

Information technology opens up an exciting new way of responding imaginatively to the needs of students and employers. Colleges need to facilitate that process, and we have the excellent example of Fife college, which demonstrated to me the use of telematics to support training in small and medium-sized enterprises. Information technology will also provide a way of delivering much of the teaching and learning at the new university of the Highlands and Islands. I am confident that further education colleges in Scotland will have more students studying more subjects with more staff and money than ever before. That is a tribute to the Government, and it is unfortunate that Opposition Members cannot see that.

Defence and Security (Europe)

10.59 am

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of Britain's role in Europe's defence and security policy and to address issues of the utmost topicality and importance.

The outcome of the first round of the Russian presidential elections last weekend has demonstrated how finely balanced are the political forces in the Russian federation. The emergence of General Lebed, with his background as former commander of the Russian 14th army in Moldova and of operational experience in Afghanistan, as national security adviser to President Yeltsin has more than domestic significance.

At the European summit in Florence on Friday, it is possible—if the beef crisis permits—that there will be discussion of Europe's common foreign and security policy. It is certainly a theme for the intergovernmental conference, and Britain's views should be more influential than most. The United Kingdom is, with France, one of only two nuclear powers in Europe, so the UK's strategic weight is disproportionate to its military manpower. We are the sole nation within NATO, apart from the United States of America, to have troops permanently stationed outside its national territory in Europe, and beyond—for example, in the Falklands and Hong Kong. Also, with principal NATO subordinate commands—Allied Forces North West at High Wycombe and Headquarters Eastern Atlantic at Northwood—Britain is the cornerstone of Europe's defence and security architecture.

With major US military facilities still located in Britain, the UK is crucial for the projection of American power to Europe and the maintenance of a balance of forces and security on the continent. In defence terms, the UK has long been at the heart of Europe. It would be even more so if it had persuaded the rest of the Western European Union to allow the other organs of the institution to join the council located in London, by offering County hall as the headquarters for the whole organisation, instead of succumbing to the European impetus towards Brussels, which seems so fundamental these days.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman so early in his speech, but does he not realise that if the WEU is to be an effective European pillar for NATO, it is essential that liaison and co-operation between those organisations has practical and real significance? That prospect will be enhanced if the WEU is situated in Brussels, where there can be regular personal and other forms of contact.

Mr. Wilkinson: I totally understand the point, but I was thinking about Britain's influence in defence affairs. As ours is an Atlantic nation, that influence should be important. The concomitant risk of locating the WEU in Brussels is that it could be over-influenced by the European Union and its aspirations to take over much of the WEU's role, but I do not dispute that there is considerable validity in the hon. Gentleman's argument.

From 1945 to the end of the 1980s, the artificial division of Europe by Soviet force of arms dominated defence debates in the House, and the necessity for deterrence of potentially aggressive Warsaw pact forces through the doctrine of flexible response determined the character and scale of the military dispositions of the western alliance and its nuclear-based strategy. Paradoxically, the division of our continent remains the greatest challenge for Europe's security policy and overall strategy.

In the days of the cold war, the imperative was the perpetuation of the artificial division of Europe through the containment of the potentially aggressive Warsaw pact along the iron curtain. Today, inclusive initiatives are emerging to hasten the end of the political divisions that plagued our continent for so long. Those initiatives are crucial in extending to fellow European nations which were denied democracy for four decades after world war two the fruits of political and economic liberty, underpinned by collective security arrangements that offer genuine defence guarantees and no provocation to any neighbouring state.

NATO's post-cold war adaptation has been rapid and remarkable. The rationalisation and reorganisation of its integrated command structure to reflect the lower level of its assigned forces have been impressive. NATO's continuation as a defensive alliance after the former Soviet forces had gone home from central Europe was fully justified by the organisation's decisive role in bringing the Bosnian war to a halt when the United Nations, WEU and European Union had between them failed. NATO's implementation force in Bosnia, which even contains contingents of non-NATO countries, has kept the peace in that country and provides the security necessary for economic reconstruction and, hopefully before too long, for successful democratic elections.

In the Gulf war, the coalition of western and Arab nations that successfully defended Saudi Arabia and liberated Kuwait was made possible by the long experience of the western allies' armed forces and military commanders of working together in NATO's integrated military structure. NATO has, through the North Atlantic Co-operation Council and the partnership for peace programme, shown commendable initiative in adapting to the realities of contemporary Europe, which is mercifully no longer imperilled by hostile ideology or aggressively configured forces.

Instability in the Russian federation, as in Chechnya and the sovereign republics on its southern flanks, provides risks and unpredictable contingencies. NATO's new Balkan involvement is supposedly limited to the end of this year, but could prove longer lasting. The impact of militant and fundamentalist Islam from Turkey to Morocco poses a new orientation to Europe's security arrangements and a real danger in the Mediterranean basin. Nuclear and chemical proliferation allied to ballistic missile transfers to aggressive regimes challenges the processes of arms control and demonstrates the need for NATO in Europe to acquire its own ballistic missile defence.

NATO's defensive credentials are impeccable, and the democratic nature of its member states unquestionable. There is no reasonable cause for delaying NATO's expansion to the east. By what justification should the genuine democracies of central Europe and the Baltic states be denied the security guarantees previously extended by NATO to Turkey, Greece and Portugal when those countries, for a time, did not have democratic Governments?

Why should Russia have a veto on the purely defensive security arrangements of sovereign democratic states? This is particularly so when the example of Norway showed that it could be—throughout the cold war, as a full NATO member—a good neighbour of Russia, with a common border and a sensitivity to the Nordic balance, which made it wholly appropriate that neither NATO nuclear weapons nor NATO foreign troops should be stationed on Norway's soil in time of peace.

Today, the Norwegian model has relevance for the full and early NATO membership of the Baltic states. The cost of Russia's interventions in Afghanistan and Chechnya have shown the Russian people and the Russian military how bloody was their denial of legitimate self-determinations and how high was the cost to the Russian armed forces—a lesson that General Lebed has never forgotten.

There has never been a qualifying contribution for NATO membership. Luxembourg has been a welcome member with only one battalion of troops, no air force and, certainly, no navy. Iceland has no armed forces at all. Importantly, through the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, there is now—there was not previously—an over-arching instrument for crisis management and for better understanding across the European continent. Through the partnership for peace there is also, of course, an experience of military dialogue upon which to build.

In the cold war, the European Community—which in those days was a purely economic organisation—never offered security guarantees or kept the peace. It was an example of free enterprise principles jointly applied for the common good. Today, the European Community—I use the word advisedly—could, as a community, be a unifying force for the new Europe rather than a potential source of division, which it promises to be as a political entity.

The objective of ever closer union via the chosen path of economic and monetary union, as laid down in the Maastricht treaty—to which the Government fatally subscribed in the fullest sense, committing themselves not only to the end of Union, but to the financial means of bringing the European Union about through the ever larger budgetary contributions agreed at the Edinburgh summit in 1992—is incompatible with the much more important goal of swift enlargement to include all the democracies of eastern and central Europe, and not only the Visegrad three.

Our deliberations in the European Standing Committee have revealed the huge additional cost of extending the common agricultural policy, on enlargement of the European Union, to the acceding countries to the east, especially to Hungary and to Poland. It is small wonder that the European Commission is now talking of admitting only the Visegrad three in 2002, with no firm date for equally eligible states such as Estonia. Why should those countries be in only the second division of applicant countries?

Applicant nations regard their accession to the European Union as an element in their overall security policy. Are western-oriented democracies to be left out in the cold? Procrastination over their entry will feed resentment among their people and their political classes, especially since the European Union is denying them access, through its tariffs, to its market for their cheap agricultural produce and, in some instances, dumping on them surplus food over-produced by European Union farmers through the munificent operations of CAP subsidies.

It is a similar tale with the Western European Union, to full membership of which central and eastern European countries reasonably aspire. If one takes contemporary rhetoric at its face value, the WEU is either the European defence identity or the European pillar of NATO. The recent NATO council in Berlin enhanced further this apparent status by affirming the assignment to WEU of combined NATO joint task forces. Those NATO formations are, in the first instance, for performing the St. Petersburg tasks of peacekeeping and humanitarian relief, but conceivably—by implication—they are ultimately for military operations when the United States does not want to invoke its security guarantee, including a nuclear option, or when it might not wish to imperil its good bilateral relations with the Russian Federation.

My hon. Friend the Minister knows that the House of Commons Select Committee on Defence was very sceptical about the efficacy of the WEU as a military organisation. However, the ministerial council of the WEU—in its Birmingham communiqué in May, to which the Government subscribed—called the WEU

"the defence component of the European Union".

As such, applicant countries take it very seriously. They do not deserve to be disappointed in their desire to join the WEU as full members.

There are two elements to Europe's defence and security policy that are of intense interest to the United Kingdom, and upon which Britain has direct influence. The first is the ambition of the European Union to arrogate to itself a military competence through armaments co-operation. The Franco-German armaments agency, which the United Kingdom has recently joined, might be the first stage in that process. If so, I believe that it will be a retrograde step.

If the purpose of the agency is to predispose the participating nations against the procurement of equipment from the United States, it could diminish the operational effectiveness of the British and European armed forces, which need to be able to buy the best equipment, or the most cost-effective equipment, from whatever source. It could have the adverse effect of excluding European industry from lucrative American programmes, recent examples of which include the C130J Hercules, the AH64 Apache, potentially the Orion 2000 and many others.

In my judgment, an imposed and unnecessary bureaucratic and managerial superstructure will not enhance cost-effective European arms procurement. The NATO management agency and the NATO Eurofighter management agency, for the Tornado and the Eurofighter programmes—to provide only two examples—were bad enough. Where would such an agency be located? How would it be staffed? How would its programmes be funded? Would it not merely duplicate the work of NATO's committee of national armaments directors, which is already experienced in seeking to harmonise operational requirements and to maximise ...pment standardisation between member states?

[Mr. Wilkinson]

The main impetus to collaboration should be commercial rather than political. This is particularly true in a world in which there is a diminishing market for armaments and in which defence equipment exports are crucial for the prosperity of defence companies.

There is a final aspect of Europe's defence and security policy to which Britain can make a key contribution. The Sunday Telegraph of 2 June reported that the Foreign Affairs and Security Committee of the European Parliament had proposed in a draft report that the EU take over the nuclear weapons now owned by Britain and France. The draft report is alleged to say that, without them,

"the European Union will never be able to adopt a common foreign and security policy".

Apparently, the report was adopted, and Marlene Lenz, a German Member of the European Parliament, was reported in The Sunday Telegraph as saying:

"If we have a union, and we need a strong union, there should be a military capability to it—and nuclear weapons would be part of that".

That would circumvent the basic law of the Federal German Republic that forbids nuclear weapons, and as French sources have suggested that the French nuclear deterrent should be held in trust for the European Union, it is important to take those dangerous aspirations seriously—for dangerous they are.

A nuclear European Union would in effect be a super-power, incapable of fulfilling, as Britain must urge that it does, its nobler destiny, which is to transform itself into a genuine community of sovereign independent states—a community whose objectives are free trade and friendship, which would be an instrument for reconciliation and harmony within a reunited continent.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on securing a debate on this important issue, but it was a pity that his Euro-scepticism so coloured his speech, especially towards its conclusion, when he spent some time on the common agricultural policy. His political attitude to the Union, which is very different from mine, means that he found himself in a way contradicting his own knowledge of defence questions, and adopting what in my view are unrealistic positions.

Co-operation and yet more co-operation is the name of the game. That has long been argued by Liberals both in the House and elsewhere; it is not a new position. I remember vividly that almost 20 years ago, in 1977, in the European Parliament of which the hon. Gentleman is so disdainful, my noble Friend Lord Gladwyn was responsible for producing a trail-blazing report on common weapons procurement in Europe. We have come some way since those days, but not far or fast enough.

As recently as 13 June, the Institute for Public Policy Research produced a document called "About Turn, Forward March with Europe". I shall quote briefly from the press release that accompanied the publication of the book, which was edited by Jane Sharp, the director of the defence and security programme at the IPPR. Apparently the document

"asserts that Britain can no longer afford, either politically or financially, to pursue a foreign and defence policy separately from her major European partners."

That contradicts what the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood said. The press release continues:

"Britain must integrate more deeply with France and Germany at all levels of defence planning and procurement.

The link with the United States in NATO remains vital but Britain has to recognise that the special relationship with Washington is over. Britain can best influence world events in future as part of a strong and cohesive Europe.

The book is critical of much conventional thinking about defence", and so on. That is a good basic position, very different from that outlined by the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell), who speaks on such matters for our party, expressed the same feeling a couple of years ago in the Defence Industry Digest, succinctly and with the clarity that his legal mind gives him:

"The European Union consists of many middle-ranking powers none of which can really afford"— again the word "afford" is used—

"to maintain a full range of capabilities but which collectively form an extremely formidable alliance. Burden sharing, force specialisation and common procurement are all areas that should be examined. Once the CFSP has developed there may be scope for greater equality in expenditure on security among member states. Britain and France, which"—

as the hon. Gentleman said—

"provide most of the capability, should be recompensed by those who spend less."

The German position, which the hon. Gentleman also touched upon, is changing and will continue to change. It has already changed, when Germany sent troops into former Yugoslavia, and it will change further. It will not remain static. The Franco-German Eurocorps and the British-Dutch marine force have developed slowly, but I think that those exercises point in the right direction.

I do not know whether the swear word "Maastricht" passed the hon. Gentleman's lips, but it certainly hovered in the air above him, so it might be useful if I remind the House exactly what the Maastricht treaty said when we passed it. As I recall, the Minister of State was most active at that time. The treaty called for the European Union to develop political co-operation, in particular through the implementation of "a common foreign and security policy including the eventual framing of a common defence policy, which might in time lead to a common defence".

The language is cautious, very likely because of the United Kingdom's reservations, but the intent is clear. The treaty both sets an objective and recognises technical and financial realities.

The hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood said that the Western European Union was possibly over-influenced by the European Union, partly but not entirely because of its location in Brussels. I believe that he said that it was subject to the risk of dread diseases by being stationed there. I am not sure whether I know what he means by the idea of "over-influence". The EU is not a monolith apart from the United Kingdom; the United Kingdom is part of it. The hon. Gentleman may not be happy about that, but it is a fact.

The United Kingdom's aim must be to work within the WEU, NATO and the EU. We must sit down with our colleagues there and work out political objectives. In our view the main flaw in previous defence reviews has been the fact that they have often been Treasury driven, rather than our having sat down and asked what we are capable of doing, who we are doing it with, how the activity should be shared out together, what we are prepared to undertake and what we are not prepared to undertake.

For example, we were prepared to undertake to try to control the situation in the former Yugoslavia, but if there were a widespread repetition of the Chechnya conflict in the Soviet Union I do not think that we would endeavour to intervene, because we do not have the capacity to do anything about such matters. We must draw lines, too.

I shall conclude by referring to the former Yugoslavia, because the hon. Gentleman touched on arms control at the end of his speech. I find the lifting of the arms embargo, which I believe took place yesterday, worrying. I do not think that it contributes much to the safety of our troops there, and I am sure that the French would agree with me. I should like to know what the Government's position is.

According to The Guardian today:

"The Bosnian Serbs will face the most radical cuts in the region"—

the lifting of the embargo is based on concomitant cuts—

"leaving them with 500 artillery pieces and 137 tanks, nearly halving their present force. The poorly-armed federation would have to acquire significant amounts of new equipment to reach its new ceilings of 273 tanks and 1,000 pieces of artillery."

Then cometh the crunch:

"However, much will depend on verification procedures and these must rely on trust, a rare commodity."

It is indeed a rare commodity, which is still, sadly, virtually absent in the former Yugoslavia. Considering the risks that we and other western European countries—notably France and the Netherlands, as well as, of course, the Americans—have taken on ourselves to try to sort out a dreadful position, opening the floodgates to more arms entering the region is a mistake.

11.30 am

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am grateful to be called and particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) for choosing this subject for this morning's 11 o'clock debate. I do not think that we have debated a more important subject in the past few weeks. The importance of it is highlighted by the fact that it takes place in the interim between the first and second rounds of the Russian presidential elections. Whether my hon. Friend chose today and the subject for his debate knowing that that might be the backdrop or it was simply a gift from the Prince of Serendip does not matter. I congratulate him on the subject and the timing of the debate.

I agree wholeheartedly with much of what my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood said—in fact, almost 95 per cent. of it. Before we came into the Chamber, my hon. Friend confessed that he was going to make one or two generalisations. On the contrary, he made a highly detailed, well-argued and tightly constructed speech, which would have done the Europeans great credit. When I say the Europeans I mean those in the 16th and 17th centuries who created those wonderfully detailed tapestries in the low countries. My hon. Friend's speech was excellent and taught us much.

It is regrettable that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood and I are the only Conservative Back Benchers present—he to make the speech and I to listen to it. Parliament is diminished and those whom we represent are less well served when such speeches are listened to only by those who have to be present and one or two others who feel it of interest to be present. I trust that what my hon. Friend said will be reported widely and digested with pleasure.

Not only those in my party have failed to attend this debate. I note that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) is wearing a very tasteful blue shirt, and I am particularly delighted that he has found time away from his duties in Scotland and elsewhere to be with us to represent his party. He always speaks with great learning and experience on foreign and defence policy, and although his speech—I hope that he will not think me rude—did not marry entirely with what my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood said, it was worth listening to. I hope that it will be digested—perhaps not quite so comfortably—by the great British public when it is read.

I look across the Chamber to the official Opposition. It is always a personal pleasure to see the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) because she speaks with great intelligence and sincerity. It is a pity that, behind her, the massed ranks of new Labour are notable for their absence rather than their presence. I am not blaming anyone, but it is worth observing that the Chamber is empty and it is a pity that the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood has been listened to with such poverty in the numbers of the audience.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): Come on, get on with it.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood, who I know is a keen critic of Europe, devoted some of his speech to the common agricultural policy. I draw his attention to the fact that the European Union donates huge sums to—I think—the Greek economy to subsidise its tobacco farmers. One could not put a cigarette paper between what my hon. Friend said and what I, eventually, will get round to saying—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear"]—on Britain's role in European defence and security policy. I fear, however, that we could put a complete cigar box between what the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber said and what my hon. Friend and I have to say.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Davis): Not much tobacco is grown in Harborough.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend is quite right. We do not grow much tobacco in Harborough.

My hon. Friend the Minister may be able to form a bridge—in so far as one is necessary—between my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood and myself, but I fear that the gap between Inverness and Harborough is unbridgeable.

There are important lessons to be learnt not only from what my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood said but from the wider political scene in Europe. We cannot understand Britain's role in Europe's defence and security policy without bearing in mind the Russian elections and what is going on there. There are three dominant themes at the centre of Russian politics at the moment. First, there is the continuing need for reform of the social and economic structure of that much-troubled country. Secondly, there is a desire for protection.

[Mr. Garnier]

Over the past 10 or so years, there has been severe dislocation in Russian society—not only since the collapse of the iron curtain but before it. Millions of Russians see themselves as victims. They are homeless, poor and out of work and fear that they will not have a home, get a job or have the domestic security that they believe was their right. During the presidential elections, demands for the people of Russia and particular sectors of Russian industry to be protected were advocated.

The third theme that ran through the Russian elections was nationhood. Now, 25 million ethnic Russians live outside the borders of the Russian Federation. The Russians, whether they live within or without the Federation, have a deep and sometimes melancholic sense of nationhood. General Lebed, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood referred, and who came third in the presidential elections, is the author of "The Dash to the South". I understand that he is now the new ally of President Yeltsin, which leaves Zyuganov as the second-placed presidential candidate—the communist—and his only hope of victory lying in the hands of Zhirinovsky. That must have a profound and direct consequence for us and the way in which we look on our defence and security role in Europe.

Sir Russell Johnston: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman so early in his speech, but surely it was a matter of encouragement that support for Zhirinovsky fell by—I think—3 per cent.

Mr. Garnier: It was encouraging that Zhirinovsky got 4.8 per cent. or thereabouts—

Sir Russell Johnston: Five point five per cent.

Mr. Garnier: It was a relatively small amount but none the less significant when it comes to tactical voting in the second round. I do not want to become too bogged down in the detail of Russian politics in the debate that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood has initiated.

What is important to us is how the new, developing Russia will regard its near abroad after the shenanigans in Chechnya. How will it regard our desire for an enlarged NATO? Will it want to expand not contract its armed forces, especially its navy, to satisfy domestic concerns and protect what it sees as its expanding capitalist economy as it looks to new markets overseas? How does that touch on us? I suggest that it affects us directly and most vitally.

Politicians of all parties—including the two main Opposition parties and those outside the House—may whip themselves into a lather over local government spending, social security spending and its consequences for future tax breaks, and the BSE crisis which, of course, are all greatly important, but they shrink into insignificance when one considers the matters that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood has addressed this morning. Another world exists outside Britain. It is changing and we ignore it at our peril.

Defence matters to us in a world where Russia is politically and economically unstable and unsure of its future and of how it is regarded by the rest of the world. Defence matters when the politicians and bureaucrats of western Europe are talking about closer integration, while our experience of eastern Europe, the Balkans and the former Soviet Union is of disintegration. Some of it, happily, has been peaceful, such as the split between the Czech and Slovak republics. Other experiences of the disintegration in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union have been profoundly violent. We need look no further than the former Yugoslavia to see an example of that.

One also needs look no further than the former Yugoslavia to see Britain's importance as a European military power with a significant and influential role to play. The work of our forces there is an example of our co-operation with our European allies, our NATO allies, those in the WEU and across the Atlantic as well as within the main continental bloc. I am glad that others have found time this morning to praise and draw attention to the work of our forces in that troubled country.

Defence matters in a world where the collapse of the Soviet bloc and the huge economic strains that that has caused has brought about huge economic migration from the eastern bloc into the west and where economic pressure has forced the peoples of northern Africa to move into southern Europe. It matters in a world where each country wishes to take a more or less aggressive stand against those who wish to move into it for economic reasons as opposed to reasons of racial, political or religious persecution.

Defence matters in a western Europe that will be failing if it refuses to look outside the confines of the European Union and to recognise the need for a strategic global overview, encompassing the transatlantic link with the United States and Canada. Europe must also recognise the importance of fostering relations with Japan and the other democracies of Asia and Australasia, not just commercially but militarily as well. An inward-looking, exclusive European Union that tries to hammer a wish list into a prefabricated mould of politically correct Europeanism, including a European standing army, a European Union foreign and security policy that takes no account of intergovernmentalism, national co-operation and the need for practical answers to questions of practicalities and which wishes to translate the WEU into the European Union and fails to see the continuing need for NATO right across our continent would be damaging and contrary to the interests of this country.

My criticism of those who advocate such policies is not to deny the need for unity of purpose or to say that this country has no place in the security picture of the European continent—far from it. We certainly need to be part of it. We have experience on the world stage as members of NATO and WEU and as one of the two European members of the permanent five on the UN Security Council. We also have military capability in manning and planning and good intelligence services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood read a passage from the European Union report published earlier this month about a desire to bring the nuclear capability of individual member states such as France and the United Kingdom within the competence of the European Union machinery. That is deeply disturbing and misunderstands the needs of the future development of the European military scene. It misunderstands our natural desire to maintain an independent nuclear deterrent.

All the experience and skills that I have mentioned, our equipment, both nuclear and conventional, our will to protect our national interests wherever they are threatened, within or outside Europe and our determination to back our words with actions suggest that the British approach to the security of Europe is better and more realistic and will work.

Since our policy commands respect beyond the limits of the European Union, on the wider continent of Europe, in the United States and, at this juncture, in the Kremlin, it is the policy that should be preferred. Although I sincerely respect the views of the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, I suspect that the Liberal Democrats' views on co-operation mean something rather different from those of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood and me. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reject them out of hand.

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on his success in securing this Adjournment debate and on his choice of subject. This subject is often lost in wider defence debates or wider debates on the European Union such as the one that we will no doubt be having in the Chamber tomorrow. The debate has provided an opportunity to focus specifically on the hon. Gentleman's choice of topic. The choice of subject is timely because of the United Kingdom presidency of the Western European Union and because of the discussions taking place within the intergovernmental conference.

When I saw the subject for debate today I wondered whether a Defence Minister would represent the Government rather than a Foreign Office Minister. I hope that the fact that it is attended by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office means that the Secretary of State for Defence is temporarily silenced after his disgraceful speech the other evening. He should go back to his history books and remember that it was a Labour Government who helped to set up NATO. We need no lessons in patriotism from him. I was rather relieved to see that the editorial in the Daily Mail described his speech as one puffed up with "patriotic bombast". That described it nicely.

The speech of made by the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood was interesting and was perhaps less strongly marked than usual with his suspicion of anything to do with the European Union, although there was a little bit of that, particularly in his exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall).

The hon. Gentleman made many valid points. One which I strongly endorse was that about the protectionist impulses in economic policy which some European countries are showing to countries of central and eastern Europe and to Russia. That is completely unacceptable. We have an economic duty to the countries of central and eastern Europe to be as open as we can. I believe strongly that it is in our long-term interests to be generous and to help create that large pan-European market that is capable of benefiting all the countries involved.

I shall comment on the Opposition's position on some of the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman and others. The Labour party has a strong commitment to NATO and see it as the cornerstone of our defence policy. Active membership of NATO and participation in it is an essential part of our defence strategy. Obviously, we agree with the comments made this morning about the fact that NATO is now, self-evidently, operating in a different European and world climate and that its role has to be re-evaluated in that respect while building on the co-operation and achievements that it already has to its credit.

Obviously, enlargement of NATO will be an important subject for years to come, and we very much welcome initiatives that have already been taken, through the Partnership for Peace programme, with many countries of central and eastern Europe and many countries who were formerly viewed as enemy countries and well outside any co-operative framework with NATO. Such Partnership for Peace programmes are important, as will be eventual enlargement of NATO, but we want enlargement of NATO to take place in a way that does not create new divisions in the European continent. We must consider that important aspect at every opportunity.

That does not mean giving Russia or anyone else a veto over any one country's application for membership, but it does involve ensuring that we work for and build a stable and peaceful European continent for the future. It is an especially difficult time for Russia, as many hon. Members have said. Obviously, we are glad that the elections in Russia took place on schedule, and we are keen, as I believe is everyone in the House, to support the continuing reform process in Russia, to help underpin democracy and to create economic relationships that will be vital for the future.

The WEU was mentioned by all participants in the debate. We welcome recent moves to strengthen the WEU as the European pillar of NATO. We welcome France's decision to reintegrate itself into NATO and to play an active part in the WEU, to which it has always been strongly attached, as it has been to NATO. We welcome the initiatives of the combined joint task forces, which were mentioned by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood, and we welcome the initiatives regarding the Petersburg tasks—which he also mentioned—of peacekeeping, humanitarian relief and so on. We believe that there is room for the WEU to take several important initiatives and act in a distinctively European way, but in a way that does not cause political tensions in the transatlantic relationship. I do not envisage any significant danger of that happening. We want the WEU, not to duplicate NATO activities, but to be able to supplement and enhance the work of the wider alliance.

In terms of the role of the European Union in this process, we feel that the common foreign and security policy should remain a separate pillar in the pillar structure as we know it, and that decisions in the common foreign and security policy should be taken by unanimity. We do not see the European Union as taking over the Western European Union, and obviously there are question marks concerning the future development of a defence role for the European Union, which make progress in this area very difficult.

The 15 countries of the European Union have somewhat different defence traditions. Some have a neutral status, although the type of neutrality of countries that profess neutral status varies case by case, naturally, because of the history of the countries concerned and their different traditions, and sometimes their different international links or geopolitical situation.

That means that, especially during the intergovernmental conference, it is unlikely that the position regarding European defence co-operation will change dramatically, but it would be interesting to hear from the Minister some more details about the discussions between European Union countries in that area.

We have all had an opportunity to read the report of the reflection group, in which the Minister of State participated, but that document is often very unsatisfactory in that it says, "Some countries thought this, some countries thought that," so we must rely on press leaks to find out what countries said and which countries committed themselves to specific policies. Perhaps, in the interests of openness in the European Union, the Minister might give us a few more details this morning about the breakdown between countries on the key issues of how the European defence identity may or may not develop in future, and what different countries in the European Union regard as the respective roles of the European Union and the Western European Union.

As the wider common foreign and security policy was mentioned, especially by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), perhaps the Minister will tell us something about the continuing thoughts of the Government about appointing a European Union foreign policy representative. I understand that the Foreign Secretary favoured that proposal but many of his hon. Friends did not.

I strongly support what was said by Opposition Members about the institutional links between the Western European Union and the European Union. We want closer relations between the WEU and the European Union; Brussels, which has been the home of NATO and the European institutions, would be an obvious place for that liaison to occur.

I am glad that there are now contacts between the WEU Assembly and Members of the European Parliament, especially the security and disarmament sub-committee of the European Parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee. It makes sense that those Members of the European Parliament who are especially involved in examining that aspect of policy within the European Union framework are able to discuss regularly with their parliamentary counterparts in the WEU Assembly. I pay tribute to the work of my colleagues here on the WEU Assembly and to the Labour Members of the European Parliament who are involved in that liaison process.

Sir Russell Johnston: Often a false antithesis is made between the advisory Parliamentary Assembly of the WEU and the European Parliament; there are reports from the European Parliament of a sort of takeover. Does the hon. Lady agree that, even if WEU becomes more integrated into the European Union, that is no reason necessarily to abolish the advisory Parliamentary Assembly, which offers a useful outlet for national Parliaments to speak on defence matters in Europe?

Ms Quin: I agree. In any case, I do not envisage the abolition of the WEU Assembly, and I believe that national parliamentarians who have built up expertise in that regard need to have a close dialogue with Members of the European Parliament, who come at it from a slightly different angle but who have an equal interest in parliamentary and public scrutiny of the matters being considered.

More generally, it appears that, despite the fears that some Members of the House occasionally express about competition between the European Parliament and national Parliaments, there is a great deal, especially in the short term, that can be done to improve joint scrutiny by both national and European Parliaments of many of the issues that are important in the eyes of the public, but are not publicly debated as much as we should like.

Mr. Wilkinson: I wish to add a further point to that made by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). Is it not the case, though, that, as long as national Parliaments have responsibility for voting budgets for national defence, and as long as national Defence Ministers are answerable to those Parliaments—indeed, in some European Parliaments, the Defence Committees have very important roles—the purpose and function of the Assembly of WEU will be central to the formulation of a common European view on defence? That is not to say that there is no merit in Members of the European Parliament taking an interest; increasing interest in, and intelligent inquiry about, matters of defence, at whatever level in Europe, is all to the good.

Ms Quin: Obviously the budgetary aspects are important, but that does not undermine the importance of the institutional links between the two bodies, which are now more necessary than ever before and which need strengthening.

We also believe in the idea of back-to-back sessions between the WEU and the relevant institutions of the Council of Ministers, as offering more co-ordination and better dialogue between the WEU and the European Union. That would make a great deal of sense.

The hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood also mentioned arms procurement. The Opposition can see important advantages in collaboration between European countries in arms production and in improving competition, but we have doubts about the way in which the system works at present. If a country is to have a 10 per cent. involvement in a project, it has to have 10 per cent. of the economic activity involved in the arms effort in question. That often seems to work against the interests of competitiveness and open tendering. Given the efficiency of some of our arms industries, we should bear this in mind when planning for the future.

Finally, I believe strongly that the end of the cold war presents us with enormous opportunities. Because of the growth of nationalisms and xenophobia in many parts of the EU—the latter is not always absent, unfortunately, from the United Kingdom—there is always a danger of renationalisation in this important area of defence and security policy. Labour does not want that to happen. We want the end of the cold war to be put to good purpose, by building on the achievements of the international co-operation that we already enjoy in defence and security matters. Based on our European and international commitments, we must try to build towards a wider, more peaceful, stable and prosperous European continent.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Davis): Our debate takes place against the background of some important developments in the European security landscape. In Bosnia, British troops are playing a leading role in the success of IFOR—the NATO implementation force—which is the largest military operation in NATO's history. In NATO itself, important work on enlargement and the changes needed to adapt the alliance to new strategic realities is under way. There is also the intergovernmental conference, the agenda of which includes European security and defence.

I therefore congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on his choice of subject and I welcome the debate which, for these reasons and for others that my hon. Friend outlined, is especially timely.

All the speeches in this debate have been of a high quality. Although I do not agree with everything that has been said, hon. Members have put their arguments cogently. I must tell my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) that building a bridge between him and the Liberal Democrat spokesman on this subject is beyond my meagre abilities—although, as he remembers, I have spent some time bridge-building with him in the past.

Because the debate is so timely, some of the issues it covers are highly sensitive, so I shall choose my language with care today, for reasons that the House will understand. I might add, for the benefit of the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin), that I am responding to the debate because, quite apart from its European dimension, my responsibilities cover international security, including NATO; the Western European Union; and nuclear weapons. There is no hidden agenda behind my appearance.

The term Europe's defence and security policy carries the risk of misinterpretation. Like many of the other catch-phrases—such as the European pillar of the alliance—it is something of a misnomer. I say that because our defence is not a purely European concern. It is primarily to NATO, a transatlantic organisation, that we owe the peace that we have enjoyed for the past 50 years, so when we consider Britain's role in European security and defence, it is right to start with our contribution to NATO.

That contribution remains substantial. On any measure, Britain more than pulls its weight. For example, our contribution to IFOR involves about 11,500 personnel—a much greater effort proportionate to population, gross domestic product or the size of our armed forces than any other nation has been able to make. We can all be rightly proud of the work of these service men and women. The shared values and interests on which the alliance was built remain as strong as ever. As Bosnia has shown, the American presence in Europe continues to be an essential contribution to security.

The end of the cold war does not mean that we no longer need to be ready to defend ourselves and to keep the Atlantic community together. For the British Government, a strong NATO remains the key; it informs everything that we do.

The experience in Bosnia has also shown that a greater European contribution is one of the most effective ways of keeping NATO strong. Two thirds of IFOR's personnel are European. France is fielding a substantial contingent—testimony to the strength that NATO will draw from France's welcome decision to participate more fully in the alliance. European countries outside NATO—Finland, Sweden, Russia and nine central European countries—are also making significant contributions.

The challenge that we face with IFOR, with future NATO operations and at the intergovernmental conference is to allow the widest possible range of European countries to contribute to security, but that must be done in a way that strengthens the Atlantic alliance. That, I believe, was the thrust of my hon. Friend's speech this morning.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) asked me a question about Bosnia. The United Kingdom is committed to keeping the balance of armaments at the lowest possible level consistent with regional security in that part of the world. The parties have committed themselves to agreed levels of armaments. The agreement was signed in Florence at the Bosnia review conference on 14 June. The NATO-led implementation force has agreed to verify compliance with the agreement, so compliance will not be, as the hon. Gentleman seemed to imply, voluntary. Verification will be done in conjunction with Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe arms control experts, leading to a verified reduction in the armaments held by some, particularly the Bosnian Serbs. Some room will be left for rearming by the Bosnian-Croat Federation, however.

Sir Russell Johnston: The fact that General Mladic is still at large and confident enough to go to Belgrade without being arrested—and still in charge of the Bosnian Serb army—leads many of us to doubt whether he will co-operate in any large-scale reduction in armaments.

Mr. Davis: I will not be drawn any further on this—nor would the hon. Gentleman expect me to be. My point stands.

Britain is leading the way towards the new flexibility goals in three key areas. First, the Atlantic alliance has not stood still as the world has changed around it. The end of the cold war and subsequent regional instability have changed the strategic environment radically. Since the fall of the iron curtain, Britain has played a key role in moving NATO towards the more flexible structure that is now required. The landmark decisions taken by NATO Ministers in Berlin on 3 June were a mark of our success. They pave the way for reform of NATO's command structure, allowing it to respond quickly and effectively to future regional crises such as the one that occurred in Bosnia.

Agreement on the combined joint task force concept will allow NATO headquarters facilities to be deployed systematically for operations involving NATO and non-NATO countries. The decision to build a European security and defence identity within NATO will allow the Western European Union to provide political control and strategic direction for European operations drawing on NATO assets, capabilities and planning.

The last point is of fundamental importance. It means, in effect, that a European identity can be built in partnership with NATO, using common structures. It also means that NATO will be able to draw strength from the desire of Europeans to do more for their security—both in operations involving all the allies and, more rarely, when the United States does not wish to be directly involved in European operations under WEU political control. This ends the prospect of any European Union identity competing with NATO—that is an important point.

Secondly, no one would claim that the Western European Union has been a central player in European security during the past 50 years, important though its actions have been. It gained useful experience in operations in the Gulf and in Yugoslavia. It will need more experience, and robust machinery for control and direction of operations using NATO assets, if it is to fulfil the role accorded to it at Berlin.

That role will not involve operations of the scale and complexity of IFOR. Such tasks must continue to be carried out by European countries working together with our north American partners. The Western European Union should be able to carry out smaller peacekeeping and humanitarian tasks, working closely with NATO and the European Union. Giving the WEU the necessary operational capability to do just that has been the top priority for the British presidency of the WEU in the first half of this year.

We have made considerable progress over the past six months. This is summarised in the declaration of the Western European Union Ministers at Birmingham on 7 May, a copy of which has been deposited in the Library. In short, we have developed working links with NATO. The conclusion of a security agreement between the two organisations last month means that the WEU will be able to receive classified NATO intelligence and information in the future.

We have promoted practical co-operation between the WEU and the EU where it makes sense for the two organisations to work together, such as in relation to evacuation planning and Mostar. We have established within the WEU a situation centre and an intelligence section, both of which are vital if the WEU council is to have the up-to-the-minute information that is needed to make operational decisions.

We have made it easier for the widest possible range of European countries to contribute to the work of the WEU by agreeing to procedures for the participation of neutral countries in WEU operations, by allowing the central European associate partners to play a greater role and by strengthening relations with Russia and the Ukraine. I am grateful for the recognition that all these measures received in the Defence Committee's recent report on the WEU, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood referred.

These developments, and the decisions taken by NATO Foreign Ministers at Berlin, are of fundamental importance for the intergovernmental conference—which is the third area that I intend to address. Defence is one of the issues that Maastricht agreed should be reviewed at the IGC. In our view, there is no urgent need to rewrite the provisions of the Maastricht treaty that deal with defence. The IGC is not central to the future of European defence—the success of IFOR and NATO adaptation is much more important to the evolution of what is sometimes called the European security architecture. The IGC must avoid decisions that are driven by institutional theology rather than operational logic—that is an important point.

Arrangements for European security and defence must respond not only to a desire for bureaucratic or institutional tidiness, but to the real security challenges that we face in the years ahead. That is why we will continue to oppose proposals that aim at an eventual merger of the EU and WEU, or subordinating the WEU to the authority of the EU. Those approaches are simply not practical—they would be a recipe for less effective, not more effective, European action.

Not all members of the EU are full members of the WEU. It would be wrong for countries that do not share obligations to defend each other's territory as enshrined in article V of the Washington treaty and to have an equal say in decisions on defence binding those who do. The Berlin Foreign Ministers' communiqué makes quite clear that NATO assets and capabilities are to be made available on a case-by-case basis for European operations under the control and direction of WEU.

It is not realistic to expect allies to make these assets available if the EU ultimately gives the orders. The EU has neither the expertise nor the purely intergovernmental structure necessary for the life-and-death decisions that are needed during military operations. There can be no question of the Government allowing the Commission, the European Parliament or the European Court of Justice a say in decisions affecting the safety of British forces; the IGC can complement the progress already made in NATO and the WEU towards effective and credible arrangements open to a wide range of European countries.

Last year, the Prime Minister set out in the House our approach to defence at the IGC. He made clear that keeping NATO strong as the bedrock of European security would be our first priority. That remains the case, and it will always remain the case. He underlined our determination to develop European defence co-operation in the WEU as a means of strengthening NATO. He proposed a reinforced partnership between the EU and an autonomous WEU so that the political, economic and military elements of European crisis management could be properly co-ordinated.

I shall now address some of the specific points that hon. Members have raised during the debate and, first, I refer to co-operation in defence equipment procurement. We play a full and active part in the western European armaments group, which is the main forum for the discussion of issues related to European armaments co-operation. We are also exploring with France and Germany the conditions for cooperation within the armaments structure that they have pioneered. Both countries have agreed in principle to United Kingdom participation. This is good news for British industry and for the British taxpayer. Discussions with France and Germany are at a preliminary stage at this point. We hope to start work soon on an intergovernmental memorandum of understanding that will define in more detail how the armaments structure will work.

We believe that intergovernmental decision-making remains the correct approach to this and to all other policy areas related to defence, but we have no desire for a "Fortress Europe" to develop. We value our transatlantic defence trading relationship and we will continue to conduct business with the United States where that best suits our requirements. We remain committed to value for money and to competition in our procurement. European protectionism is a recipe for stagnation, as the hon. Member for Gateshead, East said.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood raised the question of a specifically European nuclear deterrent. I see no advantage in addressing this issue outside the transatlantic framework. Nuclear deterrence is bound up with the defence of our territory and that of our allies. Collective territorial deterrence is a matter for Europeans and north Americans working together in NATO. No Government are seriously suggesting that that should change—we certainly are not.

I agree that to give the EU military responsibilities for which it is not equipped would impede the task of extending stability and prosperity to the east. It would create a new obstacle to EU membership for central European countries and it would unnecessarily provoke Russian fears—a point that was touched on by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough and by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood.

The developments in NATO and in the WEU that I have described today reflect the considerable progress we have made, but more can be done in the EU to improve the working relationship with the WEU. The Maastricht treaty already provides for the EU to request action from the WEU, and access to NATO assets and capabilities will put it in a much stronger position to respond to such requests in future. However, the habit of practical co-operation that we have been encouraging over the past six months must be built up if the two organisations are to work together effectively in such cases. We have proposed back-to-back arrangements from the highest level down to facilitate that.

There is sometimes a tendency in Europe to mistake pragmatism for a lack of vision. That could not be further from the truth in this case. Our approach to the IGC is based on a clear view of the defence and security policies that are needed to preserve peace and prosperity in Europe. It is underpinned by an ability and a readiness to deploy military force when circumstances require it. That ability makes our voice in the debate an influential one and it ensures that Britain will continue to play a leading role in Europe's defence and security policy.

River Claw (Pollution)

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and West Devon): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this subject, and I am glad that I have been called to introduce it a little earlier than I or the Minister expected. I raise an important matter regarding an incident that is crucial for my constituents. Although the Environment Agency and the farming family concerned have acted speedily and efficiently, the Minister may like to consider some points about the incident in planning for the future.

On Sunday 9 June, the Environment Agency received a telephone call from a member of the public who had been walking her dog along the banks of the River Claw near Holsworthy. Farming in that area is particularly difficult because most of the land around Holsworthy is classified as grade 4—the lowest ranking of land for agricultural use in our ranking system. Land categorised as grades 1 or 2 may be used to grow grain, but land graded 3 or 4 is much more difficult to cultivate. In the Holsworthy area, we are very grateful for funding for culm measures related to a rare form of wild grass that grows in the heavy clay. I am told by local bank managers that farmers in the Holsworthy area never borrow money as they cannot repay it. That demonstrates how slender farmers' incomes are.

The incident involved a local farm. A member of the public noted that five miles or so of the river had been turned a dark brown colour by slurry, which is poisonous. The Environment Agency later described the contamination as a category 1 incident. Its senior water quality officer called it a "very serious and regrettable incident". The source of the contamination was a small family dairy farm, and I pay tribute to the way in which the farmer reacted to the problem. He is anxious that I should not name him, and I shall not do so. The farmer had done the right things and he had the appropriate insurance cover. His waste management system was maintained to a high standard and was checked recently by the National Rivers Authority and identified as being 100 per cent. effective.

However, there was unusually high rainfall over the weekend of 7 June. As the water level in the farm's dirty water tanks rose, the automatic sprinkler system was triggered and the water seeped into an old, unidentified drainage pipe in a field. It then leaked into a tributary of the Claw. The clean-up operation continues. Thousands of gallons of a poisonous slurry and silage mix have entered the river, starving it of oxygen and resulting in the sad loss of trout, stone loach, salmon and bullheads.

I suggest that the incident represents a major test for the new Environment Agency, which began its operations on 1 May this year. Its handling of the clean-up has been good—even though the incident is far more serious than first thought. My main concern today is to ask the Minister: if such devastation can be caused by an otherwise well-maintained waste system, what are the chances of such devastation occurring again not just in Devon, but nationally? For example, is the Environment Agency working closely with South West Water, which must have known that the drainage pipe existed? The contamination was classified as a category 1 incident, which is the most serious. However, there have been five such incidents in the six weeks or so the agency has been up and running. That is a worrying statistic.

[Miss Emma Nicholson]

The Minister will no doubt refer to the decline in agricultural pollution in the south-west region. The record shows a welcome improvement in that regard. In 1995, there were 975 incidents—a decrease of 50 on the previous year. That represented 21 per cent. of total pollution compared with 24 per cent. in the previous year.

Farming is the main industry in my constituency and I represent in this place the views of just under 4,000 farmers. I try to protect their quality of life and their incomes. The low pollution figures are excellent, as food production, processing and distribution are very important to my constituency.

The considerable losses that dairy and beef farmers in my constituency face as a result of the bovine spongiform encephalopathy crises may spread to the wider sphere of food production, processing and distribution. That trilogy forms the mainstay of the local economy and of productivity in my constituency. The Government have so far focused correctly on the plight of farmers, slaughterers and renderers, but perhaps they could look more closely at the needs of manufacturers.

One firm in my constituency, CPC (UK) Ltd., is concerned about the way in which several of the beef-related products across its wide brand portfolio have been affected by the crisis. For example, several countries are refusing to accept exports of Bovril. I would be grateful if the Minister would consider that matter and inform his colleagues in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

In my great farming constituency, farm pollution represented a lower proportion of the total pollution in Devon last year than in the previous year. That is an excellent result. The figures were due perhaps to an exceptionally dry summer and to the fact that in 1994 and 1995 dairy farming enjoyed a period of relative prosperity which allowed farmers to invest in farm pollution control. It is proper that the polluter should pay, but I draw the attention of the House to the fact that many farmers in my constituency have small net disposable incomes at the end of the financial year—some as low as £1,500.

Unfortunately, we cannot always rely on good weather to ensure environmental safety. There is now a real danger that, as dairy and beef farming incomes go into reverse as a result of the BSE crisis and its many ramifications, many farmers will find it increasingly difficult to afford that crucial investment. I do not suggest that the large numbers of cattle that are backed up on farms awaiting disposal are adding significantly to the present pollution load—after all, they are mostly out at grass. However, if significant numbers of cows are still awaiting disposal in the autumn, the incidence of environmental pollution from slurry will increase dramatically. That adds to the importance of speeding up the necessary disposal of cattle.

A matter that relates directly to the Under-Secretary's portfolio is Government support for waste water schemes. The current difficulties of the beef and dairy industry are compounded by the withdrawal of Government support for farmers who install waste water systems. The grants were originally 50 per cent. of the cost of an effective storage and control system for dirty water from farms. They were reduced to 25 per cent. and then abolished completely. Those grants were not intended to boost farmers' profits, slender though those are in my constituency, but were for the sole purpose of environmental clean-up. If the Government wish environmental clean-ups to continue, surely those grants should be reinstated.

I seek an assurance from the Government that they will not sacrifice environmental concerns in a quest to cut costs. My concern over the lack of Government resources allocated to protecting the environment also applies to the Environment Agency. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution said in 1995 that it could find the staff for fewer than three out of five necessary site visits to ensure compliance with regulation by the industry. Staffing levels have not been increased in the new Environment Agency. The chief executive has pointed out that he has 1,200 fewer staff than was expected when plans were drawn up for the agency two years ago.

Surely those staff are essential if we are to ensure that waste storage systems are maintained and used properly and that regulations are understood and enforced. Perhaps the Under-Secretary should learn the lesson and understand the importance of ensuring compliance, especially if he looks sideways at the Ministry of Agriculture and the way in which the BSE crisis has been handled since 1985.

The Government's stated concern for the environment is also qualified, unacceptably, by a cost-benefit analysis laid down in the Environment Act 1995, under which the costs of actions by the agency have to be justified before they are implemented. It is therefore possible for someone to make a legal challenge on the costs and benefits of an agency decision that he should install expensive pollution equipment. That situation will lead to what is known as paralysis by analysis. The position is further complicated by the fact that non-financial benefits are difficult to measure against straigh forward financial costs. Respect for economic effects of environmental protection is right and proper, but not to the extent of interfering with proper monitoring. I ask the Under-Secretary to consider that point.

A former Member of the House, Lord Crickhowell, who is also a former chairman of the National Rivers Authority, provided a forewarning of the problem when he said that there must be "a mechanism for discovering what those costs are and for putting values on the environmental benefits. If that mechanism is not provided there is a real risk that almost all the Agency's decisions will be challenged to appeal, or worse, in the courts."

I ask the Under-Secretary to comment on that point also.

The Government's promises on the environment, as they affect my constituency, are laid bare by a reluctance to provide the proper resources and are riddled with qualifications. The farmers in my constituency, especially the farmer to whom this unfortunate incident occurred on 9 June, and I need reassurance from the Under-Secretary today that everything is being done that can be done to prevent such incidents from happening again. At present, to me at least, the evidence for that seems uncertain.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I can give the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Miss Nicholson) assurance on the points that she raised. I shall set out the important issues implicit in the incident and, especially, our understanding of the cause of the incident on the River Claw; the remedial and other measures that were taken by the Environment Agency in its aftermath; whether any longer-term effects will arise from the incident; what action may be taken as a result of the incident; and our policy on minimising the risk of water pollution from agricultural sources.

I should, however, like to begin by thanking the public-spirited member of the public, to whom the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon referred, who brought the incident to the attention of the Environment Agency and thereby allowed action to be taken at an early stage. I understand that the alert was given using the 24-hour free emergency pollution hotline which the agency operates and which was introduced by the National Rivers Authority in 1993. Last year, the hotline handled more than 30,000 calls, all of which were intended to allow prompt action to be taken to help protect the water environment. Once again, that initiative has shown its worth.

The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon gave a description of the River Claw, which is a tributary of the Tamar. The catchment is predominantly intensively farmed grassland, used for stock rearing. The origin of the incident appears to have been a stock farm in the upper reaches of the Claw near Holsworthy. The cause of the pollution, which the hon. Lady described, seems to have been liquid farm waste that contained some slurry. The hon. Lady called the liquid "poisonous" and I will describe its effects later, but it is important to clarify that it was liquid manure.

Slurry is organic waste. It is polluting not because it is persistent or contains toxic substances but because it has a high biochemical oxygen demand—in other words, it depletes oxygen levels in waters which it enters because micro-organisms have to absorb additional oxygen to break down the organic material. The biochemical oxygen demand of cattle slurry may be up to 12,000 mg per litre compared to perhaps 50 mg per litre for treated domestic sewage. Thus it has a severe, if relatively short-lived, impact. That is why we have measures in place to require slurries to be stored in a safe manner—measures to which I shall return later.

In the incident on 9 June, a large quantity of liquid waste appears to have drained from a store to a "low rate" irrigation system used for disposal of dirty water by sprinkling to land, as the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon mentioned. As a result, the polluted water was spread on to land by the irrigator and then entered the land drainage system and the river, resulting in the incident on Sunday afternoon 9 June.

Spreading dirty water to land to dispose it under controlled conditions is generally an acceptable method, but in this case the effects were disastrous. I understand the points made by the hon. Lady, but at this stage it remains unclear to the Environment Agency why the polluting matter drained from the store to the dirty water disposal system and why there was such a rapid loss of liquid from the store. It seems that the irrigator itself may have been operated in a manner that does not accord with the guidance given in the Government's code of good agricultural practice.

Miss Emma Nicholson: The farmer's waste management system had been cleared 100 per cent. favourably by the NRA only weeks previously. I remind the Under-Secretary that, of course, in normal circumstances slurry is not poisonous to humans, but at the time of the BSE scare we have to be especially careful with all waste products from animals that may be cull cows.

Mr. Clappison: I am sure that the hon. Lady will accept that I was trying to be precise when I described the exact effects of slurry. The important point, as I am sure she will agree, is the effect of slurry on fish and other wildlife. The hon. Lady's description of the incident is based on the information she has, but the matter will be subject to further investigation and I will describe that later. I hope that the hon. Lady will understand if I am somewhat circumspect in my remarks about the incident.

Whatever the cause, the effects of the entry of the polluting matter were severe. Oxygen levels in the Claw fell from 88 per cent. saturation, which is about what would normally be expected, to zero. About 3 km of the river turned dark brown. As a result, there was considerable fish mortality in the stretches affected before remediation began. The agency estimates that between 2,500 and 3,000 fish may have died, of which perhaps about 400 were brown trout.

The agency took remedial measures and initially focused on providing information to other relevant bodies and assessment of the polluting impact of the incident in order to concentrate remedial action in the most effective manner. The closest abstraction point for potable supply is about 45 km from the incident, so there was no threat to drinking water supply.

One of the main strands of remedial action was to save as many fish as possible. That was achieved with considerable success, I am pleased to say. About 1,700 fish were saved, of which over half were either trout or juvenile salmon. These fish were transferred to waters downstream of the incident. The second strand was to remove the polluted water from the river through pumping. Again this proved successful. The third was to re-oxygenate the river as rapidly as possible. This was achieved through the insertion of a mechanical whisk in the polluted stretch that re-aerates the water, as well as the use of other aeration equipment at other strategic sites in the Claw, to assist re-oxygenation. In addition, hydrogen peroxide—it is a strong oxidising agent—was used to introduce oxygen at strategic sites.

These remedial measures were undertaken between 9 and 12 June. By 12 June the oxygen levels in the Claw had recovered to the standards before the incident and remediation ceased. The incident was declared closed by the agency on 12 June.

The longer-term effects of the incident will be of concern. Slurry is biodegradable and the pollution was therefore primarily transient. The Claw is categorised as a class 2 river under our river ecosystem classification system, which requires, among other things, a dissolved oxygen level of better than 70 per cent. saturation. It is unlikely that there will be any longer-term diminution in the high quality of the river as a result of the incident. The agency will, however, be monitoring the manner in which the river recovers from the incident.

The main longer-term effects will be in relation to biological communities in the river. It may take up to 12 months for the invertebrates to recover. For fish, the recovery period will be even longer. The agency will be considering whether there is a need to improve spawning grounds to assist the development of fish populations. An alternative would be to introduce new stock to the river. As I have said, the incident had no consequences for any public use of the river, including drinking water supply.

The agency made use of its powers under section 161 of the Water Resources Act 1991 to undertake remedial work. It is now open to the agency to seek to recover the costs that it has incurred from any person who may have caused or knowingly permitted the polluting matter to enter the river, so that the polluter pays for the costs associated with his actions. I understand that the agency intends to take such action. I noted the hon. Lady's support for the important principle that the polluter must pay.

The agency has been gathering information that might be used to support a prosecution for an offence of polluting controlled waters under the 1991 Act. A decision on whether to take such action will be a matter for the agency. It is, however, the agency's policy to prosecute major pollution incidents where there is sufficient evidence and it is possible to do so as the person concerned can be identified. For the reasons I gave following the hon. Lady's intervention, I do not wish to say any more on that subject. I have set out the general legal framework that applies to this incident and to all others.

It has long been an offence under water pollution law to cause or knowingly permit the entry of poisonous, noxious or polluting matter to fresh waters. This approach has been successful in ensuring that those who undertake actions that are potentially polluting do so in the knowledge that they are liable for the consequences to the water environment of their actions. We should all recognise, however, that, although it is important to be able to take action where pollution has occurred, it is better to prevent that pollution in the first place.

Accordingly, in the agriculture sector, the Government have adopted an approach that employs both regulatory controls and advice and guidance to farmers and growers on how to carry out their activities in a manner that reduces the risk of water pollution. That is important. The guidance is found primarily in the code of good agricultural practice produced by the Ministry of Agriculture, which is being revised. The code has proved highly successful in setting out for farmers, their staff and contractors who handle, store, use, spread or dispose of any substances that could pollute water, the causes and results of water pollution, how best to minimise the risk of such pollution through their operations and what to do in an emergency.

The code includes extensive guidance on the principles of storing and applying livestock wastes and other organic wastes to land as well as the storage of slurry and the operation of dirty water systems. The guidance supports the regulatory requirement which we have introduced for the storage of slurry via the control of pollution regulations of 1991. The regulations specify that slurry must be kept in a reception pit or slurry storage tank, whether this is a pit, lagoon or above-ground store. They set out minimum requirements for the design and construction of such facilities.

We have recently consulted on changes to the 1991 regulations, but none is concerned with the basic standards that are applicable to the stores in question. For example, bases must be impermeable. Bases and walls must be protected against corrosion and must be capable of withstanding characteristic loads. The storage tank must have a life of at least 20 years. Failure to comply with these regulations is an offence.

I am pleased to say that the measures to which I have referred have led to some considerable successes. Farmers are certainly among those who are most concerned about the environment. They are naturally anxious to do all that they can to avoid polluting incidents.

Miss Emma Nicholson: I am glad to hear the Minister's description of the code of conduct. He knows, however, that farmers are subject to many different Government guidelines and, possibly, grants to assist them. Will he consider suggesting to his colleagues, or putting in place himself, a one-stop shop for farmers, to which they could turn to obtain advice on improving their land, on environmental matters and on available grants? It is difficult for a farmer, who is a one-family man these days, to be able to plug into all the different rules and regulations to gain proper advice and grant assistance without a one-stop shop.

Mr. Clappison: I note what the hon. Lady says. In context, the important issue is that advice has been made widely available to farmers. There is clear evidence, to which the hon. Lady adverted, that the process has been successful. The number of incidents has been falling. There is an improving picture of pollution from the sources that we are discussing. The total number of substantiated pollution incidents reported in 1995 reflected a fall of 8 per cent. Within that total, the number of incidents attributable to agricultural sources fell by 18 per cent. The number of agricultural incidents was the lowest since the formation of the NRA in 1989. Moreover, the number of major agricultural incidents—that is the highest category showing a serious effect, such as substantial fish kill—fell from 239 in 1989 to only 32 in 1995.

That is a pleasing development that reflects the efforts that the NRA and now the agency have been making in visiting farmers and undertaking anti-pollution campaigns. I know, for example, that the agency has been working with farmers in the upper Tamar on how to manage farm waste to reduce the risk of pollution. I am sure as well that it is a good reflection on farmers in the area which the hon. Lady described.

The proportion of major pollution incidents attributable to agriculture has fallen from 36 per cent. in 1989 to 17 per cent. in 1995. There is still room for improvement, but considerable strides have been taken in the right direction. As a recent agency report on pollution incidents concluded:

"This has been achieved by a combination of publicity, pollution prevention, regulations and farm waste grants. It clearly demonstrates that the risk of pollution can be significantly reduced if a sufficient co-ordinated approach is taken."

It should be clear from my explanation of the incident and from the background of our general policy that the Environment Agency should be congratulated on its prompt reaction, which averted some of the worst consequences of a major incident. The hon. Lady accepted that the agency had performed well. The incident is now over, in the sense that oxygen levels in the river have returned to normal, but the agency will consider whether further action is needed to assist the recovery of fish populations.

I hope that this explanation puts into context the results of what seems to have been a failure to comply with requirements and guidance that, generally, have been successful in limiting pollution by slurry and other farm wastes. There is still room for improvement, but such incidents are, thankfully, very much the exception rather than the rule. I am sure that the hon. Lady and the House will join me in hoping that improvements will continue and that the number of such incidents will continue to fall.

I listened carefully to the wider points that the hon. Lady made about the costs and benefits implicit in the approach of the Environment Agency. She will know that the agency, which was the product of the Environment Act 1995, was widely welcomed and supported. I imagine that the hon. Lady herself would have supported the Environment Bill, which applied well-established principles, including that of best available techniques not entailing excessive cost, which has been successful and widely welcomed. Some measure of the success of that principle can be seen in the fact that it has been adopted implicitly in European directives covering this subject, and that our system of integrated pollution control has also served as a model for such directives.

On those issues, we are on the right lines, and I am sure that the hon. Lady will join me in hoping that the improvement in the reduction in the number of incidents of agricultural pollution will continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): As the Minister who will reply to the next debate is not present, the sitting is suspended until 1 pm.

12.52 pm

Sitting suspended.

Highways (Trenchless Technology)

On resuming—

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): Essentially, this is a debate about holes—millions of holes in our roads, causing delay and disruption to millions of motorists and costing the United Kingdom millions of pounds each year. It is about the digging up of our roads so that public utilities and cable companies can lay or renovate pipes or cables. According to one estimate, the resulting disruption costs £1 billion a year—and that does not include the cost to the frazzled nerves of road users, not to mention Members of Parliament.

There is ample evidence, however, that much of the dislocation is unnecessary and avoidable. Many of the holes in our roads would not be needed if Britain made fuller use of the trenchless technologies—the underground moling techniques—that are apparently used more extensively abroad. Much of the technology is, in fact, British. Why are we so slow to use it, and to insist that roads are not dug up when moling would often be quicker, cheaper and better? Should we not always be obliged to ensure that this new technology is used wherever it might be seen to be better, and to ensure that repairs and installations are tested against its availability?

Nationally, we face a massive programme of repairs to underground services. Let me shamelessly borrow a quotation from a paper prepared by Mr. Nick Taylor of Aegis Survey Consultants Ltd., which does underground survey work. He quotes Rome's water commissioner as saying:

"these numerous and extensive works have a natural tendency to fall into decay and must be attended to before they call for large appropriations".

That was said in AD 97, but I expect the same to be true in 1997. Like, I suspect, many other hon. Members, I have encountered an increasing number of problems as a result of necessary repairs to leaking underground water pipes. The problem is acute: it is the same problem as existed in ancient Rome, but it is on an even larger scale now.

The purpose of today's debate is to try to ensure that, in future, all works are carried out, wherever it is practicable and sensible, with the use of no-dig techniques. I understand that, in 1993, of all utility installation work—I am told that it involves about 8,000 holes a day—only 5 per cent. was carried out with the use of trenchless construction methods.

There is a large and growing industry described as the no-dig industry. I have had contact with that industry through a company in my constituency called Powermole International. Some time ago, it put me in touch with the International Society for Trenchless Technology. The society has an impressive magazine called No-Dig International. There are international conferences and exhibitions, attended by a surprisingly large number of national and international companies specialising in work of this kind.

I have received information from such companies. It is remarkably interesting to learn about the fast-developing range of new technologies that are available for installing, repairing, replacing and mapping underground services; yet people still seem reluctant to use those techniques wherever possible in the United Kingdom. According to the feedback that I receive, there is still a resistance to the use of trenchless technologies, or to ensuring that work is tested against their availabilities.

According to a letter from an international company that operates in Europe, the middle east and Africa,

"the present levels of No Dig activities throughout these territories are currently strongest in the Middle East where micro tunnelling is an established means of installing pipelines under many of the cities and the highways . . . although there are several contractors in the United Kingdom who are using micro tunnelling, only about 2 per cent. of the current installation market uses such techniques. The reasons for this are probably largely down to ignorance or indifference."

Let me illustrate the point from my own experience. The company that I mentioned earlier—Powermole International in Sittingbourne—produces compressed air-powered tunnel borers, ranging from very small to very large machines. I understand that the gas industry is one of the most extensive users of the technology. I shall not venture a criticism of that industry, but even it needed a gentle nudge from the local Member of Parliament to persuade it to tunnel under the busy A2 near Faversham when installing a major new pipeline across the countryside. Had it gone ahead and dug a trench across that busy road, my constituents would have suffered serious traffic hold-ups for a long time. Full marks to the gas company: it did the right thing and tunnelled—but that should have been automatic. The nudge should not have been necessary.

I saw another demonstration in Sittingbourne high street in my constituency. A gas main was replaced in a day; had the work been done by conventional means, as is so often the case, the road would have been up for a week. The same company ran two large steel tubes under the fearfully busy A249, ramming 17 metres of tubing under the road at a rate of five minutes per metre. It was done in about 85 minutes, while the massive amount of traffic that was passing overhead continued undisturbed. Conventional means would have cost five times as much, and would have brought chaos to the road.

That company is selling its products abroad, but, although they are clearly world-class products, it seems much harder for it to achieve success here in the United Kingdom. I have no doubt that other national and international companies all over Britain will tell the same story. I hope that the House will not mind my referring to the company in my constituency; I do so to illustrate the importance of the whole industry, and the need for our country to harness these resources. No doubt other hon. Members could tell the same story about companies in their constituencies.

As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, the Transport Research Laboratory commissioned a study, completed in 1993, of the potential for reducing costs resulting from the installation of utility services under our roads. The report identified the direct, indirect and social costs, and clearly spelled out the importance of reducing disruption and dislocation. I believe that it provided the figure of about £1 billion in disruption costs. I understand that it also mentioned the importance of using trenchless technology at the planning and design stages of work.

What steps have been taken since? The study suggested that the Department of Transport should ensure that highway authorities throughout the United Kingdom examined, on every occasion, the possibility of using trenchless technology.

No one is suggesting that trenchless technology is a panacea. There will be many occasions when it will not be appropriate and holes will have to be dug—it does not magically do away with the need to dig holes. It could substantially reduce disruption, however, if the utilities and highway authorities insisted on no-dig techniques where possible.

I do not think that that would require a change of legislation—indeed, I gather that I am not allowed even to call for a change of legislation in an Adjournment debate—but perhaps the Department of Transport could toughen its codes of conduct and guidelines and demand that any contractor carries out all works in a non-disruptive fashion. Perhaps a legal obligation could be placed on those who dig the road to ensure that they minimise disruption and check the best techniques.

Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister should commission a further study into progress in reducing unnecessary road digging and into the extension of the use of no-dig techniques. There are many advantages in avoiding extensive, traditional trenching, such as the prevention of immense damage to trees and plants and the cutting of roots.

Holes and trenches create road safety hazards, and, when access to premises is disrupted, interfere with commerce and industry. Vehicles that are needlessly stuck in large traffic jams cause environmental pollution. Trenchless methods do not create large quantities of spoil and backfill, so they are environmentally friendly and cleaner, and cause less dirt, dust and pollution.

Trenchless methods are perceived as more expensive. I have seen no evidence to support that and I doubt that it is true, particularly when disruption costs are taken into account. I wonder whether there is an inertia factor, because many contractors or subcontractors would prefer to use their existing equipment and labour force, but how sad it would be if Britain were to continue to operate an old-fashioned and inefficient method when the alternatives are readily available and could be used rapidly, to the great benefit of road users and the economy.

The New Roads and Street Works Act 1991 was designed to reduce unnecessary digging and to create a register. I should be grateful if the Minister would say whether the register is in operation, and, if it is, whether it is working well. If it is not, when will it be, and what do we hope it will achieve? As a result of the Act, has there been a reduction in unnecessary and repetitive road digging by the public utilities? If there has been, it is not obvious to me as a road user.

Other countries have tougher legislation. American utilities do not have the statutory rights that our companies have, and tougher legislation may prove necessary in the United Kingdom. But how much better it would be if we could encourage a change in national attitude, so that all public authorities simply and forcefully demand that preference is given to the use of trenchless technology. That will happen only if they have clear guidance from Government. We ask this not necessarily for the sake of the companies concerned, small or large—although I say, good luck to them all—but to provide a better deal for the British road user and taxpayer and for the environment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Steve Norris): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) for introducing what might at first glance appear to be a rarefied subject—trenchless technology—but one that is extremely important.

My hon. Friend rightly suggested that we cannot afford to ignore this issue. Trenchless technology is a generic term for techniques that essentially allow equipment to be installed or replaced under the street without breaking the surface—the no-dig concept. One example of this technology is a mole that can bore a tunnel between shafts that may be some distance from the street.

There is no doubt that such technology can be useful in reducing traffic disruption from street works. My hon. Friend rightly said that, even now, a number of industry experts believe that the full benefits or potential benefits of trenchless technology are not as well understood as they might be. That is a matter not just for the Department and local authorities but for those who sell the technology and develop it commercially.

The Department is clear that, as an alternative to open-cut trenching, trenchless methods have considerable advantages, the principal of which is that it generally costs less. For example, there is no doubt that they will be significantly less expensive for running a cable under a road—a classic application. Disruption on the surface is minimised: my hon. Friend gave a valid example from his area that could be replicated throughout the country.

Trenchless tunnelling is safer for operators and for the general public, and it improves relations between the utilities and the general public, because nothing more irritates the general public and upsets their relations with, for example, the gas or electricity boards than endless disruption of local streets.

Reduced environmental and social costs are associated with the technology. My hon. Friend gave some specific and graphic examples, and the effects of fully or partially closing a road, thereby severely restricting traffic flows, are quite serious.

There are, however, some disadvantages to trenchless technology—it is not necessarily a panacea in each case. I am advised that there are limitations on the use of the technology in certain ground conditions, and there is still the prospect of failure during operations, which can be extremely disruptive. The accuracy range of the technology is limited, and operators must be highly skilled.

The Department does not formally promote the use of the technology for street works, but disruption of the highway has become an increasingly important issue in recent years, not least because of the advent of the cable companies and the tremendous explosion in information technology that has resulted in countless new cables being laid, along with the expansion and upgrading of the sewerage system, and the supply of electricity and other services to new industrial areas.

In response, the New Roads and Street Works Act was deliberately designed to improve the co-ordination of works by local authorities, because it was felt, quite rightly, that they should be in the driving seat, if hon. Members will excuse the pun, of such development. They have an incentive to encourage undertakers to consider trenchless technology wherever possible. Specific statements to that effect appear in the 1991 Act's code of practice, in the context of traffic-sensitive streets where the avoidance of disruption is particularly relevant.

In 1989, the Transport Research Laboratory was commissioned to undertake a project on the use of trenchless technology, to indicate the extent to which it could be used to avoid road opening. The resultant report, "Trenchless Construction of Pipelines", was completed in 1993, but has not been published. It suggested that new technologies could considerably reduce the social cost of traffic delays.

My hon. Friend cited some spectacular figures, but I have no reason to disagree with his conclusions. The report's findings may supply key evidence for the use of the reserve powers in the 1991 Act or for an extension of that legislation, if that proves necessary, whereby undertakers can be charged for unduly prolonged occupation of road space.

My hon. Friend would be the first to accept that it would be difficult to require the use of a particular technology as the only one available, given the myriad number of applications under the 1991 Act. We must take account of the fact that it may be necessary on occasions to allow a different methodology. However, if the utilities are provided with a real incentive to complete work in a timely fashion and with minimum disruption—using the obvious technique of charging for unduly prolonged road occupation—that might provide a spur.

We have not yet gone that far, because there has been a considerable improvement in street works co-ordination since the introduction of the 1991 Act. When a new computerised system is implemented that will enable utilities to notify local authorities more quickly and accurately than at present—allowing them to exercise their co-ordinating role to the full—further benefits will derive from the 1991 Act.

Further support for the use of trenchless technology came from the Street Works Advisory Committee report that was submitted in July 1995. It contained the specific recommendations that highway authorities should encourage the use of trenchless technology where appropriate, and that the codes of practice published under the 1991 Act should adopt a more positive approach to technology progress. Those recommendations were accepted by the Government, so we will consider amending the codes to reinforce the value of trenchless technologies.

My hon. Friend's interest in the subject is no doubt stimulated, quite properly, by a company in his constituency, but I am grateful to him for drawing attention to the subject. There is tremendous scope for improving efficient completion of necessary works, which might bring benefits much more far-reaching than those enjoyed by utilities and local authorities.

Driving Licences (Medical Conditions)

1.30 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I should first like to express my gratitude for the opportunity to have this debate today. The Minister will be aware that, on 12 July 1994, I introduced the Unfitness to Drive on Medical Grounds Bill under the ten-minute rule. The purpose of the Bill was to place a statutory obligation on medical practitioners to report cases to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency when they considered a patient to be medically unfit to drive. As is usually the case with ten-minute Bills, mine did not receive a Second Reading.

My reasons for introducing the Bill arose from the tragic death of a young constituent, Paul Scarisbrick, in a road traffic accident on the M62 in Liverpool. The circumstances of Paul's death illustrate my argument. The accident occurred because a 73-year-old man, Mr. Abrams, who was suffering from Alzheimer's disease, took the wrong turn and ended up driving the wrong way along the M62. The outcome was that his vehicle collided with Paul's vehicle, and Paul was killed.

It emerged at the coroner's inquest that Mr. Abrams and members of his family had previously been advised by a consultant at Mossley Hill hospital that, given his condition, it was unsafe for him to continue driving. Unfortunately, that advice was ignored. Equally unfortunate was the fact that the medical practitioners concerned took the decision—the consequences of which were appallingly visited on Paul and his family—not to inform the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency of their concern.

It was the practitioners' view—it is a view held by many medical practitioners—that their greater responsibility was to preserve the doctor-patient confidentiality aspect of their relationship. It logically followed that public safety considerations were of subsidiary importance.

I received a letter from the corner who conducted the inquest—Mr. S. R. Barter MBE, a respected Liverpool district coroner—who said:

"I am in no doubt in my own mind that the existing law should be changed by statute. Once a doctor has made a clinical judgment, following full investigation, that a patient is suffering from a disease which makes him a danger to himself and the public if he continues to drive, then he should be under a statutory obligation to inform the DVLA of his opinion."

That point of view should be taken heavily into account.

There have been further developments since I first raised the issue in the House two years ago. I have received a great deal of encouragement from members of the public and from a wide variety of organisations to continue pressing this issue, and I have been encouraged greatly by Mr. and Mrs. Scarisbrick, Paul's mother and father, to continue the campaign.

I received a letter from a person in Crewe. I do not have her permission to use her name, and so she shall remain anonymous. She said that she had heard about my Bill on BBC news, and went on to say:

"My father suffered a stroke four years ago and lost the use of his left hand, and movement in his left leg was severely restricted. He applied to have to his licence renewed stating that he had been ill. A new licence was sent to him and no further checks were made. My father was 74 at that time and extremely anxious to drive. As he is a widower and I am the only child I felt responsible and consequently wrote to DVLA to explain his condition, they then cancelled his licence that they had just issued. This action by me made the relationship between my father and I very awkward as he still thinks he would be all right to drive."

That letter is an example of the dilemma faced by family members who feel that an elderly parent who is in some way infirm should not be driving, and who take action. The decision clearly creates difficulties for their relationship with their parents or elderly relations.

On 29 July 1994 I received a letter from a solicitor, Mr. Bernie Rowe, of Lyons Davidson solicitors, in Bristol. He said:

"My firm deals with several thousand road traffic accident claims each year, and each year produces its 'crop' of cases, nearly always involving relatively serious road accidents, where serious injury or death has resulted from drivers who have continued to drive despite health problems which would suggest they should not be behind the wheel.

As an immediate past chairman of the Motor Accident Solicitors Society, I know of many other solicitors throughout the country who will have a similar experience to my own. I had not been aware of your initiative on this matter until today, but as a result of reading the article in The Post, I have asked the Motor Accident Solicitors Society administrator to add to the next management committee's agenda details of your initiative."

He went on to mention my Bill, which he supported.

That is some of the evidence. I have files full of evidence, but selected only those two examples because I think that they make useful and significant points.

Some 12 months ago, with Mr. and Mrs. Scarisbrick, I met the Minister, who was kind enough to arrange a meeting in his office. We all felt that it was a constructive and useful meeting. I thank the Minister for the helpful and sympathetic approach he has taken to this case and to the issues that it raises.

The Minister's position then was that, while he sympathises with the aims of my Bill, he has been advised by the lawyers concerned that it would be difficult to introduce an acceptable procedure for policing statutory obligations on medical practitioners. I think that that is still his position.

In a letter to Mrs. and Mrs. Scarisbrick, dated 13 May 1996, the Minister said:

"I would be sorry if you had the impression that progress had not been made in responding to the problem. When I wrote to George Howarth on 8 June, I included a copy of extracts from the document which the General Medical Council had recently agreed, advising doctors that they should be prepared to notify DVLA of cases of this sort, in certain specified conditions. This guidance has since been officially promulgated, publicised in national press and circulated to every doctor in the United Kingdom. Our Chief Medical Adviser has recently discussed the matter again with the GMC, and they will be undertaking some fresh publicity."

I am grateful for the action that has been taken.

So far, so good, but I remain unconvinced that those new arrangements, although very much an improvement over the previous system, provide any sanctions against medical practitioners who choose to ignore them, whether from misguided ethical considerations or from sheer negligence. Ideally, I should still like the arrangements to be put on a statutory basis. However, I realise that that is not a likely probability, at least in the short term.

I propose that the Minister enters into a consultation exercise with the General Medical Council, and with other interested parties, to discover whether it would be possible to develop a voluntary scheme that will be policed professionally rather than statutorily.

If the idea is to succeed, it must have three vital components. The first and most important criterion is that there must be a clear commitment to the reporting of such cases to the DVLA as a matter of routine, not as an exception. If a medical practitioner feels that somebody is unfit to drive, he must immediately report that fact to the DVLA. A separate set of procedures, which are extremely fair and do not make any prejudgments, is then pursued. The decision is subject to an independent medical examination.

Secondly, a clear sanction should be applied to medical practitioners who neglect to carry out that responsibility. If it could be made to work, I should have no objection if that were to be a professional sanction rather than a legal sanction under the criminal or civil law. If, when the Minister consults the General Medical Council, it can come up with such a way of dealing with the problem, I would be happy to see that go ahead, and to see whether it could be worked out without the need for statutory regulation.

Thirdly, Mr. Scarisbrick is keen, especially with progressive diseases such as Alzheimer's disease, that we should take into account the need for clear thought about how to determine at what point, in a general sense, a patient is liable to become unfit to drive for medical reasons. I know that that is a difficult concept to pinpoint, and that doctors are wary of applying generalised arguments to specific cases.

However, Mr. Scarisbrick has a point, because it is predictable that someone suffering from a degenerative disease is likely to become unfit to drive at some point. If the prospects cannot be easily determined, cases must be monitored and patients re-examined on a regular basis, to establish when they have reached the point at which they should no longer be driving.

Mr. Scarisbrick also asked me to raise four points, and I shall do so briefly. If the Minister wants to take more time to consider them, that is fine by me. I am sure that he will write either to me or to Mr. Scarisbrick about them. First, Mr. Scarisbrick feels that some progress has already been made, and he is grateful for that. Secondly, his main aim is to ensure that, once a person has been discovered to be suffering from an illness such as Alzheimer's disease, that person should not be allowed to drive. I covered that point in a slightly different way earlier.

Thirdly, Mr. Scarisbrick has noted that there are more and more reports of accidents involving older people, especially in cases involving motorway driving, in which the risks are often far greater—I believe that the Minister mentioned another such case in his letter of 13 May. Fourthly, Mr. Scarisbrick feels that, perhaps for a limited number of cases, there should be some process of medical certification when people apply for the renewal of insurance policies.

I know that the Minister is sympathetic, and equally that he is aware that, on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Scarisbrick, I have a fixed commitment to making further progress, so that the chances of another accident as horrific as that involving Paul are drastically reduced. I urge the hon. Gentleman to respond positively to my suggestion; if he wants to take it away and think about it, that is perfectly understandable. I believe that there is more progress to be made, so I hope that he will join me in that endeavour, so that we can try to reduce the possibility of any such thing ever happening again.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley, South): I shall speak briefly in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth). I feel a strong sense of involvement with the case, for several reasons. First, the M62 motorway passes through my constituency at the point where the tragic accident happened. Secondly, although Mr. Scarisbrick and his family are now my hon. Friend's constituents, after the boundary changes they will become my constituents. Most importantly, their late son was a close friend of my children and their friends; they all went to school together, and I know how devastated that small community of decent young people was by the accident.

I endorse all that my hon. Friend has said, especially the three points that he raised at the end of his speech. People in my constituency, especially those closely involved with the tragic accident, cannot understand why the medical profession does not already have a statutory duty enforceable by sanctions. They certainly cannot understand why medical opinion cannot be brought closely to bear on the problem. I hope that the Minister will be able to respond positively to what my hon. Friend has said.

1.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Steve Norris): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) for raising this important subject. As he said, I met Mr. and Mrs. Scarisbrick when they came with him to see me last year, and we had a meeting at which useful progress was made. I welcome the further opportunity given by today's debate, because this is a problem to which at least part of the answer lies in publicity, whereby doctors and the public at large will become aware of the issues and be able to act more appropriately.

There are two things to say at the outset. First, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I very much sympathise with the Scarisbricks in the sad loss of their son in an accident caused by a driver suffering from Alzheimer's disease travelling in the wrong direction on a motorway. That is a dreadful human tragedy that no words of ours can mend. Secondly, we greatly appreciate the way in which the Scarisbricks have pressed us to take measures to reduce the likelihood that further blameless drivers will suffer in a similar way in future. If they feel that, in some way, some good may come out of the terrible tragedy that befell them, I entirely share that sentiment.

Let us examine the legal position and consider recent developments, and then I shall say a word about the hon. Gentleman's proposition about doctors being liable—a suggestion endorsed by the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara). All drivers are under a statutory obligation, when applying for a licence, to declare whether they are suffering from relevant or prospective disabilities. They must also notify the licensing authority if they subsequently become aware that they are suffering from such a disability.

The licensing authority has the power to refuse an application or revoke a licence, and can require a person to give consent to the provision of such medical reports as are necessary. Ultimately, it is the licensing authority's decision, not that of a patient's doctor, whether an individual is fit to drive. Problems of the sort that we are talking about today arise when a driver is not aware of his incapacity and does not accept advice from his doctor, or indeed, from his family and friends, that he should notify the DVLA, but continues to drive.

Last year, the Medical Commission on Accident Prevention issued a revised guide entitled "Medical Aspects of Fitness to Drive", edited by the former chief medical adviser at the Department of Transport, Dr. John Taylor. That guide, which is available to all doctors, addresses those issues, and I have sent the hon. Member for Knowsley, North a copy.

It is important to underline the fact that, in his introduction, Dr. Taylor picks out for specific attention the problem that we are discussing, and refers to the unhappy case of Paul Scarisbrick. He advises doctors:

"where a patient's disorder makes him manifestly dangerous as a driver and his condition renders him incapable of taking advice that he must inform DVLA, or where he refuses to do so, practitioners have a civil law duty to immediately inform DVLA medical staff."

That is a statement of the law as it stands today. The doctor is under a civil law duty to inform DVLA.

Confidentiality is a fundamental principle on which patient-doctor relationships rest, but the guide recognises that there are circumstances in which it is right that doctors should breach that confidentiality in the public interest if the result of not doing so would be to place someone else, or, indeed, patients themselves, at risk of serious harm or death. Such circumstances do not arise often, but cases involving patients with Alzheimer's disease might well be among them.

Since the issue of the guide, the General Medical Council has amplified its guidance to doctors, emphasising that, where patients continue to drive against advice when medically unfit to do so, doctors should pass information to medical advisers at DVLA without delay. The guidelines set out in some detail the steps that a doctor should take. Where the patient cannot understand the doctor's advice—for example, because of dementia—the doctor should inform DVLA immediately.

Where a patient understands the advice but refuses to accept it, doctors should suggest a second opinion, and if that does not do the trick, approach the patient's next of kin. If those efforts of persuasion fail, the doctor should pass the information in confidence to DVLA. Those guidelines, which were approved by the General Medical Council about a year ago, give doctors clear guidance on their responsibilities—both to their patients and the public at large—when faced with such circumstances, which are often very worrying.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North made an extremely important point when he mentioned the family who were upset because they had to advise an elderly member of the family that he should not drive. There is no doubt that that is precisely the sort of circumstances in which relatives are extraordinarily diffident. Friends, too, are diffident about insisting that someone—perhaps with whom they live—should give up a facility from which they derive great practical benefit, which represents a final sign of aging or of suffering from a particular ailment that is unlikely to improve. That is a traumatic and difficult time.

There is clear advice from the GMC that, if relatives' efforts of persuasion and second opinions fail or advice is understood but simply not taken, the doctor personally should pass the information in confidence to the DVLA. It has been put to me very clearly by a doctor with whom I recently discussed the matter that, bluntly, that is what doctors are there for. In such circumstances, they have to be clear where their duty lies.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North has suggested—his private Member's Bill incorporated the suggestion—that there should be a specific statutory obligation on doctors to refer cases to the DVLA when they believe that a patient is unfit to drive, which would go beyond the principles that I have described and, in a sense, apply a sanction to a doctor who was deemed not to have made a suitable notification. I understand that there is such legislation in north America, but our research suggests that, in practice, it has not been effective. The reason is fairly straightforward.

It would certainly be very difficult to frame legislation that avoids a potential effect on the confidential doctor-patient relationship, but, more importantly, there is a risk that such a statutory provision would discourage patients from taking their problems to doctors. It is entirely predictable that patients whose condition varied would, if they did not feel particularly well on the day that they were due to be examined by their doctor, find some reason for cancelling the appointment and present themselves only when they felt that they were at their best. Doctors would rapidly develop a risk aversion, which would not be helpful either to them or to their patients.

I know of at least one case of a patient being examined by a doctor who came to the conclusion that, on balance, the patient ought to be allowed to drive. That patient subsequently caused a death due to dementia or psychosis that rendered him incapable of driving, yet the doctor had exercised his judgment and there was no suggestion that he did it with other than total responsibility and professionalism.

My Department and I have taken the view that, in such circumstances, it is intolerable to expose doctors to the risk of penalty or litigation when, in effect, the law is exercising that marvellous commodity known as 20:20 vision hindsight. On that basis, and bearing in mind the strong advice that I have described, we have so far remained unpersuaded that legislation such as that suggested by the hon. Members for Knowsley, North and for Knowsley, South is desirable.

Mr. George Howarth: The difficulty that I have with that concept is that, for whatever reason, some doctors will take what I consider a misguided ethical position on doctor-patient confidentiality. Although that is one problem, I must be honest and say that some doctors are so hard-pressed that they take the line of least resistance. There must be some compulsion on doctors in such circumstances so that they feel that, on balance, it is better to take the decision than, on balance, leave it on one side.

Mr. Norris: I entirely understand that point. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman and I are at odds on what we want the outcome to be. We want doctors clearly to understand their duty. The hon. Gentleman would introduce a legal constraint on them. I have said that, although I quite understand the merit of that argument, there would be a prospect of some serious disbenefit to doctors who are simply trying to do their best. As I have said, there is very clear guidance, which, if I may paraphrase, says to doctors: "Be under no illusion. Your confidential relationship with your patient is extremely important but it cannot be more important than the life of an innocent bystander or another driver such as Paul Scarisbrick, or, indeed, patients themselves. In those circumstances, your duty, general practitioner, is entirely clear."

I will not, of course, close my mind or say that the Department's mind is closed on the matter, and I shall look at the idea of incorporating declarations on medical insurance forms, which may have some merit. Without any prejudice, I am happy that we should do so.

The main message should go out very clearly to doctors, and I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North for giving us the opportunity to send it. It is very simple: if in doubt about the ethics of disclosure, rather than whether the patient is fit to drive, be in no doubt. In fact, there is no doubt that there is a very distinct obligation to report. The judgment on suitability is of course a matter for doctors themselves.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufacturing Industry

1. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to discuss developments in manufacturing industry at the next meeting he attends with his European Union counterparts. [32107]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): My colleagues and I meet regularly with our European Union counterparts to discuss a range of industrial issues. Later this afternoon I shall be meeting the Swedish Minister for Industry and Energy, Mr. Anders Sundström.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank the President for that reply. Given that the occasional paper on United Kingdom investment performance shows that manufacturing investment is lower now than in 1979, and the latest output figures show that we are technically in recession, does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the Chancellor that our poor manufacturing record could be made worse by the antics of the Tory Europhobes who, even now, could be scaring off inward investment?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman might need to be reminded that under this Government total investment has risen six times faster than under the Labour Government. Manufacturing investment in plant and machinery is up 12 per cent. since the beginning of the recovery and up 10 per cent. last year alone. The hon. Gentleman is painting a somewhat misleading picture. I am encouraged by that strength of investment, which will lead to greater output and better export figures in due course.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: When my right hon. Friend next meets his European counterparts, will he remind them that Britain is more competitive today than it has been for decades? Will he remind them that between a third and a quarter of all inward investment in the past 10 years has come to this country rather than to the rest of the European Union? Above all, will he remind them that whereas Britain is creating jobs—we have more people in work than ever before—the rest of Europe has 18 million unemployed and that figure is rising?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That inward investment is a measure of our increased competitiveness. As a result of our policies, overseas companies, many of them European, are flocking to the United Kingdom. When the Leader of the Opposition was in Germany yesterday, I wonder whether he reflected on the fact that, last year alone, 58 German companies decided to locate in Britain, fleeing from the sort of stakeholder economy with which Labour wants to saddle us.

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that investment in manufacturing is lower in real terms than when the Government came to power and that, far from what was just said by the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown), in manufacturing output we are seventh out of 15 in the European Union? Will he acknowledge that we are not even in the top three for unemployment, investment or inflation, and that we had the largest total trade deficit in Europe in 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 and almost certainly in 1995? Is it not the case that, far from being the enterprise centre of Europe, under this Government Britain has slipped from 13th to 18th place in the world prosperity league?

Mr. Lang: The right hon. Lady is talking nonsense and giving a totally misleading picture. She seems to have forgotten that since 1980 the United Kingdom has had the fastest growth in gross domestic product—equal with Germany—the fastest growth in productivity bar none, the fastest growth in manufacturing output, the fastest growth in investment, the fastest growth in private consumption and the lowest tax burden. The right hon. Lady should give a fairer and more accurate picture of what is going on in this country.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the President of the Board of Trade agree that sometimes the opposition to investment in the United Kingdom comes from some short-sighted British firms who object, for example, to the Europe Tool Company from South Korea investing in Northern Ireland? Some of those firms are actually purchasing tool components from Korea that could be manufactured in the United Kingdom by British industry.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that the economy of Northern Ireland has benefited enormously from inward investment into this country. I believe that most of those decisions are taken for long-term reasons, because countries throughout the world can identify the improvement in productivity and competitiveness in this country, and therefore in their manufacturing plans for the global market they regard the United Kingdom—including Northern Ireland, obviously—as the best base for exporting into the European market and beyond. The dramatic success that the United Kingdom has had in attracting inward investment is a tribute to the progress that has been made under the present Government.

Mining Industry

2. Mr. Skinner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next expects to meet those in the mining industry responsible for (a) production and (b) health and safety. [32108]

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): My ministerial colleagues and I meet representatives of the coal mining industry as appropriate.

Mr. Skinner: When the Minister next meets Richard Budge, who since privatisation is the principal owner of most of the mines in Great Britain, will he tell him that it is pretty clear to most people in the mining industry that Mr. Budge is cutting corners on safety in order to make massive profits to the tune of £173 million in the first year of privatisation and to line his own pockets to the tune of £661,000? Is the Minister aware that accident rates have increased by more than 50 per cent. and falls of ground by more than 80 per cent.?

Will the Minister order Richard Budge to ensure that, as in the old days, the National Union of Mineworkers and other trade unions will have the right to meet at properly instituted safety committees? If Mr. Budge will not allow that to take place, independent inquiry should be set up into the escalating accident rates in underground mining.

Mr. Eggar: When I next meet Mr. Budge, I shall congratulate him on the fact that, in 1995, deep-mine production has increased by 10 per cent. on that of 1994. I shall congratulate him on the fact that, despite the best efforts of Mr. Scargill and his cronies, including the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), there were no strikes in the coal mining industry last year, for the first time since records began.

On safety, I shall not hesitate to point out to Mr. Budge that, sadly, the record in the last nine months of 1995 was as high as 8.18 accidents per 100,000 man shifts. I shall also point out to him, however, that that compares extremely favourably with the accident rate in 1979, which was almost 12 times higher, at 94.6 accidents per 100,000 man shifts. I might also ask him to suggest that the hon. Member for Bolsover apologises to the House and to the miners of this country for so misconstruing the position.

Mr. Luff: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what he has just said could be summed up as "Britain is producing more coal more safely"? Is that not a direct tribute to the wise policies of privatisation that he has personally pursued so energetically in the House? How would that compare with the continued policy of nationalisation so slavishly advocated by the doctrinaire and dogmatic members of so-called new Labour?

Mr. Eggar: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. Back in 1994, the hon. Member for Bolsover said that he wanted renationalisation of the coal industry without compensation and the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), speaking from the Opposition Front Bench, said:

"I would be astonished if our plans to rescue the coal industry after the next election did not involve public ownership."—[Official Report, 23 March 1994; Vol. 240, c. 313.]

I notice that the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has been completely silent on that issue.

Electricity and Water Companies

3. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received regarding the ownership of the electricity and water companies. [32109]

Mr. Eggar: My Department has received, and continues to receive, various representations about the ownership of electricity and water companies.

Mr. Prentice: Does the Minister agree with his friend and colleague the prince across the water, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who believes that electricity and water do not mix and, indeed, said as much in The Times on 1 June? Does the Minister further agree with his colleague that British utilities are becoming the adventure playground of corporate capital, that the Government are paralysed by indecision, that there is no clear policy framework and that the Minister is responsible for chaos and confusion throughout that vital part of British industry?

Mr. Eggar: I always give the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) the attention that they deserve.

Mr. John Marshall: May I ask my right hon. Friend not to pay too much attention to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), who was such a disaster when he led Hammersmith council? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, since the water industry entered the private sector, there has been a massive increase in investment, which has led to better quality water supplies?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is also fair to point out the significant real fall in electricity prices for domestic and industrial consumers.

Mr. Battle: In the face of the ad hoc restructuring of the United Kingdom electricity industry, with its daily bids and takeovers, is not the Government's confused for-and-against response simply generating more chaos? On the same day as the Secretary of State overruled the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and blocked PowerGen and National Power's takeover bids, he allowed Eastern to buy some of the generators and form the sort of vertically integrated company to which he says that he is opposed. Will the Minister confirm, as is well known, that he was opposed to that decision by the Secretary of State?

Why is there still no sign of a clear Government strategy or direction? While the mania for bids and takeovers means quick cash for speculators and directors, customers are increasingly becoming a mere afterthought as a result of the Government's approach.

Mr. Eggar: Typical customers are benefiting from a reduction in their electricity bills, this year and next, of about £90. That is a clear benefit of privatisation, and there are many others associated with it: improving standards of service in the electricity sector, and doubled investment in the water sector following the massive under-investment under the Labour party in the mid-1970s.

Mr. Congdon: Is not the most significant aspect of the ownership of those industries the fact that they have been transferred from the dead hand of state ownership to the dynamic private sector? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proof of the pudding is in the fact that the old nationalised industries cost the state £50 million a week but now benefit the state to the tune of £55 million a week?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

Council of Ministers (United Kingdom Veto)

4. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those European Union agreements relevant to UK industry that have been delayed as a consequence of the Government's decision of 21 May to use the UK veto at the Council of Ministers. [32110]

Mr. Lang: The principal measures relevant to industry where Ministers have withheld agreement following the Prime Minister's announcement on 21 May—[Interruption.]—concern legislative simplification and administrative co-operation, accounting standards—[Interruption.]—an action programme for EU industry and certain agreements concerning trade relations with third countries.

Mr. Marshall rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. There is too much talking going on. I want to hear the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Marshall: I know that you, Madam Speaker, could not hear the Secretary of State's response any more than I could, so I shall have to pretend that I did.

Madam Speaker: Indeed, I could not hear it either.

Mr. Marshall: When will the President and his fellow Cabinet members realise that the Government's position on Europe, far from progressing a solution to the beef crisis, is hindering a solution to it and harming Britain's competitive position? Will the right hon. Gentleman estimate the cost to British industry of the blanket veto that this country is currently exercising on EU business?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman may have his own opinions about the effect of the veto, but the Government took the view that it was necessary to bring to the attention of our partners in Europe the great importance that we attach to a solution to this problem, and the need to have in place a framework for lifting the ban, which was not scientifically justified and was imposed without being backed up by scientific evidence. The cost will be very low indeed if the ban is lifted soon and we can resume business as normal, but the cost to British industry if the ban remains in place will be considerable.

Sir John Cope: Before anyone gets too worked up about the backlog of EU business, will my right hon. Friend confirm that, the moment agreement is reached on beef, all outstanding matters can be quickly put through any available ministerial Council in 24 hours, as what is known in the jargon as an "A point"? What matters is reaching an agreement on beef. The veto has simply put beef back at the top of the European Community agenda, which is where it should be.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right: once the matter is resolved, the United Kingdom will be as keen as any other participant in the European Union to make speedy progress on the other matters that are being held up.

Dr. Howells: Will the President of the Board of Trade say whether he will be attending the Council of Ministers a week from tomorrow to reverse the Government's previous policy on the Post Office? Will he be casting his vote behind the Commission's proposals to liberalise direct mail services and thus threaten the future of the Royal Mail by sneaking through, by qualified majority voting, a privatisation measure that the House rejected last time it was debated?

Mr. Lang: The Labour party seems to be in a muddle about its policies on competition and on the Post Office. No, I will not be at the Council myself.

Mr. Waterson: Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that a significant section of British industry is represented by companies such as Anglo-Dutch Meats in my constituency, where some 350 jobs are under threat as a result of the wholly unlawful worldwide ban imposed by the European Union? Does he agree with me and with many of my constituents that until our European partners choose to approach this matter on the basis of science and not from political or commercial considerations, the British Government should continue to use their veto wherever they think appropriate?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right, and he emphasises the importance of having the matter resolved quickly. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear precisely when and where our veto will be exercised. We hope that the matter will be resolved soon, that a framework will be in place for the lifting of the ban, and that business will return to normal.

Industrial Development (Maryport)

5. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next intends to visit Maryport to discuss matters relating to industrial development. [32111]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John M. Taylor): Although I have no immediate plans to visit Maryport, I have made regular visits to the north-west since becoming a DTI Minister and I am well aware of the issues in Maryport.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister ask the Secretary of State, who is sitting next to him, whether he is prepared to call in on Maryport, which is in my constituency, in the next few weeks on his way home to his own constituency in the Borders? The visit would give him the opportunity to discuss with Maryport town councillors the escalating difficulties of the town. It would also give him the opportunity to explain why we cannot have back the development area status that we lost some years ago, a loss which is now costing us dearly.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman can take some comfort from the fact that unemployment in his constituency is now falling by 8 per cent. He will remember debating these issues with me in an Adjournment debate on 4 March. I remind him that Maryport is an assisted area, and any investment proposals that create or safeguard jobs will be considered for support. West Cumbria is also an objective 2 area and eligible for European funding for business support measures, training and reskilling.

European Regional Development Fund

6. Sir David Knox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the value of grants allocated to England from the European regional development fund since its inception. [32113]

Mr. Eggar: It is £7.1 billion in 1996 prices.

Sir David Knox: That is a significant figure. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the grants are playing an important part in strengthening the British economy? Does he believe that the British people are aware of the nature and scope of these grants? If not, what is he doing to publicise them?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: the grants are an important part of assistance to the appropriate regions. As my hon. Friend knows, his constituency is in the midlands uplands area, which is eligible for objective 5b assistance and it received a programme allocation of £10 million. Assistance through the regional assistance programmes of the European Union is an important contribution to the successful economic growth not only of this country but of the European Union as a whole. This is just another example of the tremendous benefits that we gain from being part of the European Union. It is assisting us to establish ourselves as the enterprise centre of Europe.

Mr. Pearson: Does the Minister believe that the shambles of the current European regional development fund round is due to non-co-operation among Brussels officials, incompetence in Government regional offices, or both?

Mr. Eggar: There have been delays in taking decisions about a number of structural funds and much of the responsibility for that lies with Brussels. Government officers and I have been trying to speed up the decision making on those grants. Above all, we must ensure that we get good value for the money that is disbursed. That is why we introduced the regional challenge programme and why the private sector is able to benefit from European regional development funding. That decision has provided a further £800 million in joint funding. We must continue to improve the speed of disbursement and the quality of disbursement decisions.

Innovative Technology

7. Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new proposals he has to improve innovative technology in industry. [32114]

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): The information society initiative, the crusade for biotechnology and the LINK programme are key departmental initiatives. Business links is appointing innovation and technology counsellors.

Mr. Flynn: Is not a principal reason why Britain has slumped from 13th to 18th in the world prosperity league table the fact that the average British company spends twice as much on dividends as it spends on research and development, while the top 200 companies spend three times as much on research as they spend on dividends? As the tiny country of Taiwan registers more patents than Britain and a single Japanese company registers more patents than all of British industry, are we not doomed to slump even further in the world prosperity league as we become a nation of branch factories for innovative, successful Pacific rim companies?

Mr. Taylor: The Government's policies have encouraged greater business expenditure on research and development in the past few years. However, I do not disguise the fact that I would like to see even more investment in that area. I am concerned about the level of investment in research and development among British companies, which do not compare well—I exempt the pharmaceutical industry, of course—with world-class companies. The hon. Gentleman should remember that a patent alone is not a guarantee of success: it is the exploitation of ideas that is important. There is a considerable movement in British industry and in the science base to try to ensure that we exploit ideas that are generated in both industrial and university laboratories.

Mr. Fabricant: In contrast with the negative comments of the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), is it not a fact that the crusade for biotechnology has encouraged major British firms to experiment and to develop products in that area? Is not the largest pharmaceutical company in the world a British company and based in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend is right. The crusade for biotechnology, which was launched by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and me yesterday, is a remarkable effort across Government Departments to highlight the importance of that sector to the United Kingdom. There are several measures which show our determination to support new British companies that are emerging in the biotechnology area, to support the science base, and to encourage the spin-out of ideas and the protection of intellectual property. The move was warmly welcomed by a number of leading biotechnologists from large and small companies and also by leading academics.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: If we exclude the pharmaceutical and chemical industries, does the Minister agree that there has been an 11 per cent. fall in manufacturing investment in research and development since 1986? Is he considering the request from the Select Committee on Science and Technology that the Government review fiscal incentives for research and development so as to improve our appalling performance?

Mr. Taylor: Fiscal incentives as such are a matter for the Treasury. We always keep under review what is occurring in other countries. The most interesting point about the fiscal base in this country is that it is often cited as a factor by companies wishing to invest here. I welcome the increasing number of research and development projects that are coming to this country as a result of the Government's overall economic management. That is a key factor and, allied to our excellent science base, I am sure that the hon. Lady will join me in welcoming the increase in research and development which is often encouraged by overseas investors in this country.

Balance of Trade

8. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the United Kingdom's trade balance with EU countries in the last quarter for which figures are available. [32115]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Anthony Nelson): During the first quarter of 1996 the United Kingdom had a deficit in trade in goods of £994 million with EU countries.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank my hon. Friend for that response. What action does he believe British industrialists could take to improve the level of exports to the Community? Does he agree that the Community is either a common market or nothing, and that there is no need for us to go deeper into a political union with Europe with a common currency and funding common defence and foreign policies?

Mr. Nelson: We still have a long way to go to take full advantage of the single market, which we pioneered and which we still have an obligation to see through. Undoubtedly, however, our exports have seen exponential growth there, characterised by a large number of small to medium-sized companies that employ many people. Exports are not important in themselves, but in the employment to which they give rise. The Government's policies of low inflation, low taxation, low interest rates and low non-wage costs—all distinctively British and Conservative—have resulted in high exports and substantial growth of small to medium-sized businesses in Europe. We should welcome all that.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Why is the Minister being so modest when the President of the Board of Trade revealed on 20 February that Britain has the worst deficit in the European Union apart from Greece, whose most memorable export achievements are the Elgin marbles and Nana Mouskouri? When Italy, Germany and five other neighbours have trade surpluses and we have a deficit, is it any wonder that the Conservatives have relegated this country in 18 years to 18th place in the world prosperity league?

Mr. Nelson: I thought for one shocking moment that the hon. Gentleman was about to break ranks by not asking a dismal and despondent question putting Britain down, but of course he fell into line. The truth is rather different.

Mr. Griffiths: Explain the decline since 1979.

Mr. Nelson: I will. Many of the figures that are given for deficits relate to trade in goods and do not necessarily take account of trade in services, and we are one of the few countries in Europe that has a surplus on that account. We have seen tremendous growth, which we should all welcome, in our exports to Europe, characterised by manufacturing exports. The picture is much brighter and the hon. Gentleman does his party and the country no service by trying to paint it otherwise.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will my hon. Friend confirm that Britain exports more per head than the USA, Japan and our main European competitors? Does he agree that that is because this country is unfettered by the social chapter and the minimum wage?

Mr. Nelson: My hon. Friend is right. This country has an outstanding record on exports, not only in absolute but in comparative terms. Much of that record derives from the fact that we have not imported high wage costs and non-wage costs from the European Union in the social contract. We must ensure that the difference between the parties on that issue is brought into sharp relief for the country and the electorate, because it is a key component of job creation and exports for this country.

University Research Equipment

10. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the equipment needs of UK universities for research purposes. [32117]

Mr. Jon Taylor: Research equipment and other needs of the science budget are assessed with advice from the Director General of Research Councils. The research councils are currently administering an equipment fund with the higher education funding councils.

Mr. Hughes: Has the Minister seen the recent survey, commissioned by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals with the higher education funding councils of England, Scotland and Wales, which concludes that four out of five university departments are unable to conduct critical experiments due to lack of funding? The survey also points out that the situation has deteriorated since the previous survey in 1987. In view of those facts, will the Minister abandon the folly of cutting university funding by half over the next three years and instead re-inject capital funding, as has been requested by the academic, business and industrial communities?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is selective in his quotation from the report. It also shows that 80 per cent. of universities consider that their equipment is better or at least adequate. That is an important factor. More than 52 per cent. consider that their equipment matches well with that of their international competition. The report is complex, not least because 91 universities responded, not all of which we would regard as being at the forefront of research. The figures must be examined closely.

We recognise, however, that universities have equipment problems which have an effect on research. That is why the Department of Trade and Industry, through the research councils, is administering a joint equipment budget, and why I have asked my officials to discuss with the vice-chancellors ways in which we can solve long-term problems, including a better way to allocate equipment between universities, a second-hand market and attempts to obtain bulk purchases. More details will be revealed when I am satisfied that we have got to the bottom of the problem.

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that that answer will satisfy anyone who is interested in our science and research base, least of all the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals and the higher education funding councils. Is the Minister prepared to accept that their assessment, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) referred, points out that there is a crisis in our science base and that cuts in research funding and equipment have seriously damaged our international competitiveness? If he is not prepared to accept that, I accuse him of indifference to what is happening to our science and research base. If he accepts the finding, it is not long-term solutions that are needed but immediate and quick ones to recover what has been lost.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman should read the reports with a good deal more consideration. It is a simple fact that 25 of our universities receive 70 per cent. of the total equipment budget. That means that they are the excellent universities in categories 4 and 5 in the research assessment exercise. We are keeping a close check to ensure that our research is up to standard and of the quality required.

There are many complicated factors. If we analyse the reports, we find that about 147 magnetic spectrometers are required by universities throughout the country. There has been no discussion to ascertain whether they are all required, whether there should be bulk purchase, or whatever. Surely the hon. Gentleman agrees that, in those circumstances, a more rational approach to the long-term problem of funding equipment in our universities is required, which is precisely what I have already worked on with my officials. Indeed, I have talked to Professor Gareth Roberts, the vice-chancellor of Sheffield university.

Pyramid Selling

11. Mr. Rendel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to make the regulations covering pyramid selling more restrictive. [32118]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government fully support the provisions of the Trading Schemes Bill, which has just had its Second Reading in another place. The Bill will extend the application of existing controls on pyramid selling to money circulation schemes. As and when it becomes law, we will introduce revised regulations.

Mr. Rendel: Does the Minister agree with me in welcoming the proposed changes and agree further that anyone who becomes involved in such a money-changing scheme is ill advised? Does he agree also that the public would be well advised to avoid such schemes like the plague?

Mr. Taylor: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I remind him of what Sir Richard Scott said in the High Court about a recent case, and one that the hon. Gentleman knows about. He said that it was "highly unsatisfactory, highly suspicious and thoroughly undesirable".

The hon. Gentleman is right to warn his constituents, and I mine.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Minister will be aware that in some instances 400 or 500 people at a time are being enticed into crazy schemes that require them to put up large sums with no visible return of any sort. Will he therefore make his views public so that people throughout the country are aware that the schemes are a straightforward scam? As soon as the law becomes operational, I hope that many people will find themselves in the courts.

Mr. Taylor: I accept the hon. Lady's sentiments entirely. My most immediate opportunity to make my views public is now. I remind the House that, in the past 24 months, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made 13 applications to wind up companies promoting money-making pyramids. There are other applications in the pipeline. The applications have led to 12 orders to wind up. One case is pending.

British Energy

12. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the sale of British Energy. [32119]

Mr. Lang: Good progress continues to me made on the sale of British Energy. As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Energy announced last week, the final date for registration is 24 June and the UK public offer opens on 26 June.

Mr. Smith: The Minister for Industry and Energy recently dismissed the independent report produced by Dr. Sadniki on the liabilities associated with the sale of the nuclear power industry as absolute garbage. As the Minister failed to justify that assertion in yesterday evening's debate, would the President of the Board of Trade attempt to do so today?

Mr. Lang: The report is so full of misconceptions and inaccuracies that it would be impossible to do so in an answer to an oral question. There are a number of misconceptions and the figures do not relate the accurate position. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the prospectus.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the success of the nuclear industry in being able, in effect, to return most of the non-fossil fuel levy to consumers means that people's bills will rapidly become smaller? Is it not a complete con on the public for Opposition Members to suggest that they could raise £3 billion out of utilities such as electricity without once more increasing energy prices?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The fall in the levy from 10 to 3.7 per cent. will be worth about £15 to £20 off the average household bill. He is also right to draw attention to the wide difference in approach between the two parties. Our view is that the benefits that come from privatisation should continue to go to the consumer, as they are doing; whereas the Labour party wants to impose windfall taxes, which would penalise consumers, impose a new tax burden and strongly discourage precisely the competitive approach that is so improving the service of utilities in this country.

Manufacturing Output

13. Mr. Olner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the output of manufactured goods in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries (i) in 1979 and (ii) at present. [32120]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Phillip Oppenheim): Since 1979, the share of manufacturing in total output has fallen by a quarter in both the OECD as a whole and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Olner: The Under-Secretary has obviously put the best spin he possibly can on those figures. Will he confirm that, since 1979, 2.76 million jobs have been lost in manufacturing industry, and during that period this country slipped from 13th to 18th place in the world prosperity league?

Mr. Oppenheim: In the unlikely event that the hon. Gentleman finds himself standing in the position I am in now, I suspect that he would also try to put a good spin on whatever figures are fed to him. I suspected that he might quote the Institute of Management Development report rather than the World Economic Forum report, which showed Britain's position rising from 18th to 15th place. In a totally non-partisan spirit, however, I am happy to stick to the IMD report that he quoted and point out that the countries that it shows have made the most improvement over the past decade are Hong Kong—the free market capital of Asia—and Chile and New Zealand, which perhaps have made even more progress over the past decade than this country in deregulating and opening markets. That is hardly an endorsement of Labour policies, whatever they may be today.

Mr. Gallie: Does my hon. Friend agree that the aerostructure industry plays an important part in our manufacturing output? On that basis, does he agree that overseas success is dependent on a strong home base? Will he make representations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to ensure that, when the Nimrod replacement or refurbishment programme is determined, British Aerospace at Prestwick gets a fair look in?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is, as ever, a good advocate for his own constituency. He is right to point out that two high-tech industries that have done well in Britain over the past 17 years are pharmaceuticals and aerospace. Close to my own constituency is Rolls-Royce plc, which was almost written off as a basket case in the 1970s but which has since trebled its share of commercial aero-engines and is now a successful, profitable company.

Mr. Hoon: Does the Minister agree that, notwithstanding the Government's extravagant claims about the current state of the British economy, the 0.3 per cent. decline in manufacturing output in April compared to March and the fall in manufacturing output in each of the previous two quarters means that the British economy is in recession?

Mr. Oppenheim: No, I do not agree, not surprisingly. I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that, in the past quarter, manufacturing in Britain rose at a time when it is stagnant or falling in the rest of Europe. I ask him, because I know that he has an expansive mind, to look at the big picture. During the 1980s and 1990s, Britain's manufacturing productivity growth was the fastest of all the major economies in the world. Our manufacturing output has grown faster than that in all the other major European Union countries. I also remind him that, when his party was last in power, our manufacturing productivity growth was bottom of the league of major nations and our manufacturing productivity output actually fell.

Sir Michael Grylls: Does my hon. Friend agree that the biggest contribution that any Government can make to help manufacturing industry is to maintain a stable economic climate and, above all, keep inflation down? The Government have been very successful at that. I really wonder how the Opposition, with their appalling record on inflation, which destroyed jobs in manufacturing industry, have the impertinence even to question this.

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is right. Not only was the record of the great macho men of manufacturing on the Opposition Benches one of falling manufacturing output and stagnant bottom-of-the-league manufacturing productivity, but hundreds of thousands of jobs in manufacturing were lost every year under the previous Labour Government. Perhaps that is why the report that the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) quoted showed Britain's competitiveness above that of France and Italy, while the World Economic Forum report showed it above that of Germany as well.

Manufacturing Trade

14. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the balance of trade in manufactured goods in the latest quarter. [32121]

Mr. Nelson: There was a deficit of £2.5 billion on trade in manufactured goods in the first quarter of 1996.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Minister aware that the United Kingdom's trade balance in manufactured goods went into deficit in 1983 for the first time since the industrial revolution, and has remained in deficit ever since? Given that this country has a worse trade balance than any other European Union member state, how on earth can the Government claim that they are making Britain into the enterprise centre of Europe? The truth is that the President of the Board of Trade is the captain of a team that is at the bottom of the European league.

Mr. Nelson: That is another extremely depressing analysis, completely unrelated to the facts. Since the Conservative party came to office, the number of manufacturing exports has doubled. Moreover, the hon. Gentleman referred only to manufacturing exports. We have a £5.5 billion surplus on our services account.

It is necessary to look at the whole picture. Like so many of his hon. Friends, the hon. Gentleman is highly selective and extremely deprecating about our trade performance. Much is going well. He would do better to concentrate on success stories such as that of Exabyte in his constituency, which has created 200 jobs—and what about Walter Alexander, also in his constituency, which has sent £20 million-worth of exports to the far east and created another 200 jobs? Those are good jobs, created by the policies of a Conservative Government.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: Talking of competitiveness, is my hon. Friend aware of the revised World Economic Forum global competitiveness league? The United Kingdom has moved up in that league: we are now No. 3 in Europe, at 15th place, while France and Germany have been relegated to 22nd and 23rd. That suggests that we are indeed becoming the enterprise centre of Europe.

Mr. Nelson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting the record straight. He is right to point out that our trade and export performance has been moving up the league in both absolute and relative terms. All that reflects the implementation of Conservative policies in practice and in government. Those are the policies that will create lasting jobs in this country.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the Minister speaking, or even perhaps listening, to the Confederation of British Industry and our leading exporters, all of whom are saying—certainly to Opposition Members—that they are very concerned about the Government's policy on Europe? The current activities and divisions in regard to interference with decisions by the European Commission lead them to fear that the Government's commitment in their major trading area is weakening. Do not the CBI and our global performance—based here, but global—need the assurance of a strong commitment to Europe that they are not gaining from a party that is riven by divisions on where it is going in Europe?

Mr. Nelson: Of course I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's conclusion. Conservative Members assert that there is no incompatibility between fighting our corner hard in Europe and being strongly in favour of the ambitions and objectives of the economy that Europe can create by acting in concert. This party in government will always stand up for our interests, but it will always play its part in Europe. The hon. Gentleman, the CBI and everyone else should be left in no doubt about that.

Mr. Forman: Can my hon. Friend confirm that our balance of trade in manufactured goods in some of the fastest-growing markets in the global economy is healthy and improving? Are there not encouraging examples in, for instance, our trade with parts of Asia and the Pacific rim?

Mr. Nelson: There are indeed. I pick out countries such as Indonesia and India—[Interruption.] Even if we do not take into account some of the military equipment to which Opposition Members have referred from a sedentary position, our exports in key sectors such as power generation, construction and water infrastructure have been outstanding. They are in surplus, and there is every prospect of their increasing further.

Computer Equipment (Libya)

15. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the conviction of McNeill International in the USA on a charge of exporting educational computer equipment to Libya. [32124]

Mr. Oppenheim: No.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the Minister recollect that, shortly after leaving the Department, the right hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Needham) made a characteristically candid statement, expressing his exasperation with the Foreign Office for having put spokes in the wheel of trade in vehicles between Bedfordshire and Libya? Are we quite sure that we are not once again being taken for a commercial ride by the Americans? Libya is our traditional market; the decision makers were trained in Britain and not in the United States.

Will the Minister look carefully at this case, because some of us think that the Americans have quite cynically scapegoated Libya, that the Libyans were not responsible for Lockerbie, that it is doubtful that they were responsible for the murder of Yvonne Fletcher, and that it is doubtful that they were responsible for the La Belle discotheque incident, which caused the bombing?

Mr. Oppenheim: I always genuinely listen to the hon. Gentleman carefully, but it strikes me as odd that he and some of his colleagues always kick up a fuss—sometimes understandably—about equipment exports from Britain to other regimes that they find distasteful, such as Burma, yet want us to export to the more distasteful, authoritarian and, in many ways, vicious regime of Libya. It was not British goods being exported to Libya and stopped but American goods, which the Americans stopped a British exporter indirectly exporting to Libya via a third country. The Americans have their own rules on exports to Libya, and in this instance they asked for our assistance in helping to prevent their laws from being broken on their soil. We gave that assistance and would expect it to be reciprocated if the situation were the other way around.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is the Minister aware that McNeill International could be prosecuted for exporting radiographic equipment to Libya? Libya is about the only country in the world that is denied treatment for cancer simply because of what seems to be a rather mad policy. In view of that and of the fact that, on 26 May, a citizen of Lebanon was arrested, extradited and brought to trial in Germany for the Berlin bombing, which we and the Americans used as the excuse for bombing Libya, might there be a case for reviewing a silly, cruel and heartless policy?

Mr. Oppenheim: I cannot comment on the individual case, unless my hon. Friend gives me the details, but we have a policy of strictly adhering to United Nations sanctions on exports to Libya. The Americans have their own rules, which go further. If the Americans decide that they do not want to export certain goods to Libya, that is their business. Where it becomes our business is if they try to claim extra-territorial rights, by claiming that they have some say beyond the UN sanctions over what we or other countries export to Libya or other countries.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There is a lot more to this, and I hope to raise it on the Adjournment.

Deregulation

16. Dr. Spink: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the impact of deregulation on inward investment. [32125]

Mr. Oppenheim: Our deregulated business environment is recognised as one of our key strengths by inward investors. It is one of the many contributory factors that have made the United Kingdom the No. 1 location for inward investment into Europe.

Dr. Spink: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if this or any Government followed the European model or, indeed, the socialist model on regulation and interference, inward investment would fall?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is right, and I will give him one good example of where our policies of deregulation and open markets have led to more inward investment. We were leaders in deregulating and privatising telecommunications. We were opposed at every step in liberalising telecommunications by scare stories that were published and peddled by Opposition Members. We were told that telecom engineers would be electrocuted up telegraph poles, that little old ladies in remote communities would be cut off and that telephone boxes would disappear from high streets. We have seen instead the most rapid improvement in telecommunication services coupled with falling prices and an increased number of telephone boxes of any major industrial country, which has helped to attract business to Britain and jobs for British people.

Mr. Purchase: Will the Minister admit that about one quarter of all inward investment has been for the purpose of purchasing British companies, and that the cumulative total of capital exported from this country on the same basis is far in excess of the sum invested in Britain? Does that not show that Britain's so-called deregulated economy is less attractive to investors than so-called regulated economies elsewhere?

Mr. Oppenheim: Either the hon. Gentleman is one of the new Labourites who believe in the open market or he is not. If he does believe, as his party apparently does, he should accept two-way investment flows. The Germans, who have a more regulated market than ours, invest more in Britain than we do in their country. Conversely, we export more to France than the French invest in Britain. That is the nature of a modern global economy. Perhaps the Germans know something that the French do not.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: As Britain attracts more than 40 per cent. of US and Japanese investment in Europe, does my hon. Friend agree that that might have more to do with an observation made last week by George Simpson, chief executive of Lucas Industries, who is to be the new chairman of GEC? He commented that, in 30 years in business, he could not remember a time when economic policy was managed in such a way as to produce a better competitive environment for British industry.

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That state of affairs is in stark contrast to the position that we inherited. I remember a trade union leader saying that he would only buy a Ford car made at one of the company's German plants. In the 1970s, General Motors and Ford were falling over themselves to push investment out of Britain and did not export any cars from this country. Today, GM, Ford and the Japanese companies Nissan, Toyota and Honda are exporting vast numbers of cars from Britain. Even Rover, which manufactured international jokes such as the Allegro and the Marina when Labour was in power, is successfully exporting no less than half its output.

Electricity and Water Companies

17. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received regarding the ownership of the electricity and water companies. [32126]

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice).

Mr. Chisholm: The Minister made no attempt to answer earlier questions on the subject—perhaps because of his disagreements with the President of the Board of Trade. Will the hon. Gentleman lay down even one principle in place of the confusion and chaos that currently typify Government policy? Will he acknowledge that consumer interests should take precedence over takeover and dividend mania? Will he be more ready in future to refer bids to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Eggar: I agree with the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Ingram), who is all in favour of competition. I detect from the questions of the hon. Members for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm) and for Pendle that they do not entirely agree with the hon. Member for East Kilbride.

Research and Development

18. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the Government's policies in encouraging British businesses to increase their investment in research and development. [32127]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Evaluations of past research and development support show that it enhanced the amount and scope of the R and D undertaken and enabled firms to complete projects earlier. Support for collaborative R and D has improved interaction between industry and the science base. The recent "forward look" publication shows business expenditure on research and development is increasing in real terms.

Dr. Jones: If Britain is to become the enterprise centre of Europe, does the Minister agree that it must improve its performance in research and development—which, with the honourable exceptions mentioned earlier, lags way behind that of more successful economies? Last week's White Paper showed that, while dividend pay-outs have inexorably risen, investment in R and D is not even back to the pre-recession level. Will the Government stop dismissing the importance of fiscal incentives to encourage profit retention for investment over dividend pay-outs?

Mr. Taylor: The trouble with the Labour party is that it is increasingly giving the impression that it opposes dividends, which shows a fundamental lack of understanding of how financial systems work in this country. Dividends are a vital part of growth in the value of pensions. However, I accept—as I have done earlier today—that British companies should pay more attention to the percentage of their sales spent on research and development. That is a matter of considerable importance, and I shall say more about it when the latest research and development scoreboard from the DTI is published next week.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that response, in which he implied that we are not investing enough in research and development—as we are not investing enough in industry generally. Will my hon. Friend make further proposals to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to the Treasury to enhance investment, not least in research and development, using fiscal measures that encourage success?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend, who is a great champion of manufacturing industry, knows that investment plans in industry are best prepared against a background of low inflation, low interest rates and stable economic management. We are delivering those things, which is why we are increasingly receiving the enthusiastic support of inward investors and of UK industry. However, I am always on the lookout for measures that might stimulate research and development.

I repeat that there is absolutely no way in which British companies will be able to compete into the next millennium if a much greater effort is not made in research and development by British companies in relation to the best companies worldwide. More chief executives should pay attention to the rate of change of innovation and the rate of change in how products are introduced to the market.

Takeover Provisions

19. Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to alter the takeover provisions affecting UK companies. [32129]

Mr. John M. Taylor: We have no plans to alter the current takeover provisions.

Dr. Wright: Does the Minister accept that firms that live in permanent fear of takeover are unlikely to put long-term investment before short-term returns? Does he accept that British firms are peculiarly vulnerable to takeover, especially to foreign takeover, because of the laxity of our takeover rules? Is it not time to revisit the rules by which British firms must live and—too often—die?

Mr. Taylor: On the first point, takeovers play an important part in ensuring that companies are run efficiently, which is in the interests of shareholders and consumers alike. If managers want to retain control of their firms, they must run them as efficiently as possible. As for foreign shareholdings, few countries enjoy more overseas corporate control than the United Kingdom. Inward investment is a two-way street, and it is very welcome.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister seems to be telling us that successful companies do not get taken over. Given the profitability, success and strategic importance of the Royal Bank of Scotland to the Scottish economy, does the Minister welcome the fact that the takeover threat to the bank appears to have receded in the past two weeks?

Mr. Taylor: The existing merger control provisions in this country are satisfactory at the statutory level and at the non-statutory level. Each case is examined on its merits. As for a merger of a particular bank in Scotland, that is a commercial decision for the parties. The necessary statutory and non-statutory issues would be brought into being only if competition issues arise subsequently.

University Research Equipment

20. Mr. Chidgey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the effect of reductions to the education budget on the funding of equipment for research in universities. [32130]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) a few moments ago.

Mr. Chidgey: Is the Minister aware that, as a direct consequence of the lack of funding for equipment, universities are now unable to undertake critical experiments, and that multinational firms are consequently switching their research programmes from British universities to universities overseas? Does he accept that there is an urgent need for the Government to support universities' budgets, particularly the current £474 million shortfall for priority equipment alone—which is five times the amount that they have had available to spend in previous years? Does he accept that the Government must take some action to help on this issue?

Mr. Taylor: I do not accept that our best research universities are in the state that the hon. Gentleman describes. Nothing I see as I go around all those universities suggests anything other than the excellence of the research that is being carried out. We must be careful about spreading stories about the top universities in this country having such difficulties.

I do not deny that the forefront of research requires the forefront of equipment, which presents particular problems as the pace of change impacts on our research base. However, it is for the vice-chancellors to manage their affairs properly. It is evident that in not all cases have universities properly allocated money for research equipment in accordance with the ambitions that they publicly discuss.

I need much more information from the vice-chancellors to enable me to see what is going on. I underline the fact that, judging by the citations and the articles now being published, British universities are producing excellence, and inward investors welcome the accessibility and excellence of that research base.

Political Donations

21. Mr. Winnick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will enter into discussions with the Confederation of British Industry over donations to political parties. [32131]

Mr. Lang: I see no reason to do so.

Mr. Winnick: There is every reason to do so. Does the Secretary of State not realise how scandalous is the fact that those in industry who donate to the Conservative party are, in the main, the same people who receive the peerages and the knighthoods? Since November 1990, when the Prime Minister arrived at No. 10, of the five peerages and 53 knighthoods given to industrialists, more than two thirds have gone to people involved with companies that have given millions of pounds to the Tory party. The situation is scandalous, and certainly needs reviewing. I hope that the Secretary of State will understand the concern that it causes.

Mr. Lang: If anything is scandalous, it is the Opposition's sour and mean approach to such matters. The fact is that directors have a legal duty to act in the interests of their companies, and all companies must disclose in their company accounts contributions for political purposes of more than £200. The beneficiaries must also be disclosed. That is a fair and sensible way forward.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Did you notice that I have been sitting quietly during Question Time—[HON. MEMBERS: "Unusual."] Yes, very unusual. I have been observing the questions being asked, and twice as many Opposition Members as Conservative Members have spoken. Often no Government Back-Benchers at all sought to ask supplementaries on the important subject of trade and industry. When we discuss the pay of Members of Parliament, may we discuss some aspect of performance-related pay, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: That will be a matter for the hon. Gentleman to put to the Leader of the House tomorrow. However, I must tell the House that I am gratified to see that today we have reached a total of 20 questions plus supplementaries. I congratulate the Board of Trade team and Back-Benchers, who have, in the main, been speedy in their questions and answers today.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Further to the point of order that I put to you this morning, Madam Speaker. I understand that Mr. Speaker Weatherill's ruling of 17 February 1992 blocks the early-day motions that I attempted to table last night relating to the North Wales police and child abuse. I should be grateful if you would reconsider the position, because it now seems that one cannot table a motion or a question for oral or written answer; one cannot speak in a debate or, probably, even introduce a Bill drawing on the experience in Clwyd. One cannot raise the issue in a Select Committee or a Standing Committee either. A wall of silence will surround the passage of the Government motion later tonight.

I cannot defend that in my constituency. My constituents were involved, and there are things that should be done before that motion is passed. We should have had a debate in the House on child abuse, and the Secretary of State for Health should have made a statement on the Utting review. This morning a Welsh Office Minister tried to convince me that the Jillings report was defamatory. That is rubbish. What are they trying to hide?

Finally, I want to expose the fact that 25 years ago there was a report on Bryn Estyn, one of the homes involved in the Clwyd child abuse case, but it was never published because the Home Office suppressed it. We cannot close down debate in the House of Commons on an issue as important as child abuse.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have a ruling. I am quite prepared. I have carefully considered the points of order that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) raised yesterday, to which I replied, as well as this morning at 9.30 am, and have looked at the two proposed motions that she has attempted to table. I am satisfied that one of her motions breaches the campaign rule, to which she referred and to which my predecessor referred in a ruling that he gave on—the hon. Lady is correct—17 February 1992 at column 21. As the hon. Lady, I understand, has now been informed by the Table Office, I am content that the other motion be tabled.

Obviously, the hon. Member for Cynon Valley is aware, however, that this motion, along with the three other early-day motions that she tabled on Monday, will be withdrawn automatically as a result of the operation of the House's sub judice rule—that is the House's sub judice rule, not a ruling of the Speaker—if and when the motion setting up a tribunal of inquiry is agreed to by the House. If she is seeking a statement from a Minister or a debate on the matters before that motion is passed, she should ask questions of the Leader of the House tomorrow. She should deal with her Front-Bench team about having the subject placed on the Order Paper. Of course, she will be aware, as the House is aware, that in raising her voice in objection to the motion, which is now on the Order Paper, the setting up of the tribunal will be delayed.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Further to the point of order, Madam Speaker, raised by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on performance-related pay. Like him, I sat quietly through Question Time—

Madam Speaker: Order. Performance-related pay is not a matter for me. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Devlin: The point of order is simply that, if we were to be paid on that basis, and given that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley represents only 55,000 constituents whereas I represent 80,000, would he be paid five eighths of my salary?

Madam Speaker: If our pay were performance-related, I would say that I spend more time here than anyone.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): As the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) observed Members rising to speak in Question Time, I observed the hon. Gentleman never at any time attempting to get to his feet. Does that suggest that he has no interest in trade and industry?

Madam Speaker: I think that we have had a good exchange on the matter.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will be aware that the Select Committee on Health is undertaking an extensive inquiry into all aspects of children's health and well-being. Will you clarify whether the ruling that you have just made means that the Select Committee cannot take evidence on Clwyd?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Lady has given me no notice of her point of order and I am not aware of how far the Select Committee has proceeded. I would certainly have to look at the matter before I could give a ruling. I would want to be absolutely clear about it.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Over the years, it is inevitable that many Speakers' rulings have raised proverbial eyebrows, but none more so than that given by Lord Weatherill in 1992 on campaigning to which you referred. Who makes the judgment on whether something is a campaign? Who initiates it—the Government, the Speaker, or other Members? Such decisions seem to come out of thin air, when the matter is inconvenient.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. Such rulings do not come out of thin air. They come out of very deep consideration of the precedents of the House. Those precedents are sometimes changed. I am prepared to change them if it is common sense and for the convenience of the House. I have looked very carefully at the campaign ruling, especially on this issue, and have given rulings that I think are in the best interests of the House at the present time.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. You have certainly been extremely helpful. Will you clarify a matter for me? Yesterday, the Government also announced that there would be a review of the care and abuse of children and of children's homes and residential accommodation throughout England and Wales. I am particularly concerned about problems that have been encountered in Cheshire, which is also very much in the news. Will you confirm that there are no restrictions on Members who want to take matters forward in respect of England and Wales, but especially in respect of Cheshire?

Madam Speaker: As far as I understand it, the hon. Gentleman is quite correct. There will be no restrictions. The Government's announcement was perfectly clear and it is being interpreted correctly by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have gone as far as I can. I have answered four or five points of order on this issue and I can go no further now. If the hon. Gentleman has anything to say to me, I will be pleased to see him to discuss it.

Water (Supply Pipe Responsibility)

3.39 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock and Burntwood): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to impose a duty upon water companies to maintain and repair domestic supply pipes.

It is appropriate on a fine day in the middle of a fine June for the House to consider the matter of water. When I asked one of my colleagues if he would sponsor this Bill, he was moved to observe that, although he knew that new Labour was characterised by a desire to extend responsibility, he was surprised to learn that the extension of that responsibility now embraced water supply pipes. Let me explain.

A few weeks ago, an elderly lady came to see me. She brought her water bills with her, which, like so many others, she was worried about not being able to pay. She also brought with her a leaflet that she had just received from the South Staffordshire water company about which she was even more worried. It was seeking to sell her an insurance policy and was accompanied by dire warnings of the consequences that would befall her if she did not take up the offer—an offer that she could not afford.

The leaflet is now being distributed across much of the country and I shall read from it because it explains what my proposed Bill is about. Under the stark heading

"They thought they were covered", it says:

"As a home owner, you probably already know that the underground water supply that runs from the main external stopcock to your home is your responsibility. What may surprise you, though, is that in the event of a flood caused by a burst pipe, it is unlikely that any standard home insurance policy will cover the cost of repairs . . . and these repairs can be expensive—a burst main in your garden, for instance, may well mean the hire of heavy digging equipment."

Examples are given of the expense and trauma experienced by householders who suffered such a fate before they saw the light and bought the company's insurance scheme. One person is quoted as saying:

"I had to have all my underground pipes and drains removed. I wish the scheme had been invented earlier, as the work was very expensive."

Another person said:

"What prompted me to get the scheme was a burst pipe—it was a very traumatic experience".

We then have a plumber who says:

"Before the Home Service Scheme, I used to dread presenting customers with the bill at the end of a job."

I hope that the House will understand why my constituent and many like her suffer such anxiety when addressed in this way. She was already worried about her ability to pay her water bills and was then further worried by the prospect of huge repair bills and an insurance policy that she cannot afford. That is the situation that my Bill seeks to tackle.

It is neither sensible nor fair that householders should be responsible for the supply pipes that run underneath their gardens. Similar arguments apply to sewers. I have a constituent whose garden is currently awash with unpleasant emissions from broken sewers—not his—for which nobody will assume responsibility. However, my Bill starts with water supply pipes. The time has come to transfer responsibility for supply pipes from householders to water companies, and that is what the Bill would do.

The old water authorities had come to the view that that was sensible. Before privatisation, the Government consulted on whether the new companies should be responsible for supply pipes. In relation to the problems of leakage and contamination, the Government's consultation paper said, rightly:

"Whilst the water industry has no direct responsibility for these pipes, those problems are likely to remain unresolved."

In the event, and no doubt influenced by the imperatives of privatisation, the Government decided not to proceed with a transfer of responsibility. That was a major missed opportunity. It is now time to put it right.

Not only would that be fair, but there would be other considerable advantages and benefits. It would help us to tackle the problem of water leakage, which currently and scandalously accounts for between a quarter and a third of all the water put into supply in this country. About a third of that leakage comes from supply pipes, for which the water companies can at present disclaim responsibility. That surely makes no sense. Water companies alone have the expertise, equipment and resources to tackle that problem; householders do not.

If responsibility for pipes through to the internal stopcock were transferred to the water companies, it would offer the opportunity for concerted action on leakage. It would also make it possible to dispense with all the troublesome valves and joints that are currently required because of the need to police the boundary between company pipes and consumer pipes. The potential benefits in terms of leakage reduction are considerable.

A recent article in the journal Utility Week made the following assessment:

"Put simply into numbers: if companies are twice as efficient as individual customers at managing pipes and leakage, then around 17 per cent. of leakage would be saved simply by this change of responsibility and management, at no net expense to anyone. More sophisticated figures are needed, but this would be a similar order of saving of water resource to that of the whole of the government and Ofwat's metering plans, without any of the social welfare loss and extra costs they are said to involve."

What is true of leakage is also true of lead, where it is only the companies that can do what has to be done, especially in meeting the tougher targets of the new drinking water directive in promoting public health.

Above all, my proposal is fair. The present position is scandalous, anomalous and indefensible. Other utility suppliers—gas, electricity and telephones—are responsible for what they supply right up to people's homes. Consider the consequences that would follow if that were not the case. Yet water remains an anomalous exception, and the effect of the anomaly is to burden householders with a responsibility that they are unable to discharge and to remove responsibility from the water companies for essential repairs that only they can realistically undertake.

As recently as a few days ago, the Director General of Water Services wrote to all the water companies to ask them how they proposed to discharge their newly acquired duty to promote the efficient use of water. I have a copy of that letter. One paragraph is headed "Customer supply-pipe leakage". This is what it says:

"Companies claim that leakage from customers' supply pipes is a major source of waste. They have powers to issue waste notices which require customers to mend their pipes and, if necessary, to repair the pipe themselves and bill the customer. Many have been reluctant to do so, because of the uncertain financial impact on the customer or house-owner. Companies, however, have a financial interest in the reduction of such waste in that water treatment distribution costs are saved."

The letter ends:

"Companies' plans should include their approach to supply pipe leakage, including services and assistance they offer. Some companies have introduced a free leak detection service to encourage the detection of leaks. All companies should consider this step, and how they might help their customers with the costs involved—for example by providing a low cost repair service. In certain situations, in particular, in areas affected by company water-use restrictions, companies should consider providing a free detection and repair service."

There we have the regulator telling the companies to get to grips with the issue of supply pipes, yet because of the statutory position there is no coherent approach. Some companies are doing very little. Others, led by South Staffordshire, are trying to sell profit-making insurance policies. Severn Trent Water Ltd. has a flat-rate repair scheme. North West Water Ltd. is offering free repairs for a year.

That cannot be satisfactory. A basic responsibility of that type should not depend on where one lives. That is why, as the industry's consumer service committees are starting to say, the time has come to make the companies directly responsible for supply pipes.

My final observation is designed to be helpful. Last night we irrigated Holland, and we all feel a lot better for it. Today, the water companies could make us feel better still by voluntarily assuming responsibility for people's water pipes. Their tarnished reputations would instantly be enhanced by truly Venables proportions. They do not need to wait for the legislation that I am proposing to do the right and sensible thing.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. Tony Wright, Mrs. Helen Jackson, Mr. Richard Burden, Mrs. Jane Kennedy, Mr. David Hanson, Mr. Jeff Rooker, Ms Estelle Morris, Mr. David Jamieson, Mr. Paul Tyler, Mr. David Nicholson, Mr. Frank Field and Miss Kate Hoey.

Water (Supply Pipe Responsibility)

Dr. Tony Wright accordingly presented a Bill to impose a duty upon water companies to maintain and repair domestic supply pipes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 12 July and to be printed. [Bill 155.]

Sentencing Proposals

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. I have also had to limit all Back-Bench speeches to 10 minutes.

3.50 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move,

That this House supports the proposals set out in the White Paper 'Protecting the Public' to introduce automatic life sentences for serious violent and sex offenders; mandatory minimum prison sentences for persistent house burglars and drug dealers; and to introduce greater honesty into the sentencing process.

The first duty of any Government is to maintain law and order, to ensure that their citizens can walk the streets in safety and sleep safely in their homes. I shall refer this afternoon to a coherent series of policies which add up to a central theme that gives the White Paper its title, "Protecting the Public". This is the objective that I have put at the top of my list of priorities since I became Home Secretary over three years ago. It is a continuing programme, building on real achievements.

This week alone has seen the announcement of new funding for local projects to tackle crime, the opening of the new crime prevention college at Easingwold, new proposals for dealing with sex offenders, and a White Paper published today on the future development of the criminal record system. If we maintain this impetus, real progress can be made.

Recorded crime in England and Wales has fallen for three consecutive years since 1993. Over this short period there has been a reduction of nearly 500,000 recorded crimes—the biggest fall since records began. We cannot be certain of continuing that trend with every set of figures, but it is a massive reduction that reflects great credit on the police, who lead the world in the use of new technology such as closed circuit television to deter and detect crime.

The White Paper records progress in our strategy. Partnership is developing. Only last Friday I saw an excellent example of partnership working in Plymouth, where the police and local people have developed a concept of community policing. Each ward has its own team of police officers who liaise regularly with community representatives.

We have given the police the powers and resources that they need to fight crime. We have increased spending on policing by 100 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79, to £7 billion. The figures for 1996 will show an increase of 16,000 police officers since 1979. There are now 17,000 more civilians to support the police, and there will be funding to allow the recruitment of 5,000 additional police officers over the next three years.

We have not hesitated to provide additional powers—not just the new public order powers in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, but new powers for the police in relation to bail, such as the power to attach conditions to police bail and the power to arrest defendants who breach bail.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Chapter 9 of the White Paper to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers concerns fairness in sentencing policy. I recently wrote to the Home Secretary about the murder of one of my constituents, Wayne Margrave, who was run down and killed. The car driver also severely injured a young lady who was caring for my constituent. The man responsible was sentenced to four years, but if this document is implemented he will be out in two. When I asked that the matter be referred to the Court of Appeal, no assistance was forthcoming from the Government. In the context of fair sentencing, will the Minister give that case serious consideration?

Mr. Howard: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's constituents who are victims of that dreadful crime, but he needs to put the case with a degree of accuracy. He will know that there could not have been a conviction of murder in that case, because, if the conviction had been of murder, the sentence would have been life imprisonment and not four years' imprisonment. He has written a letter about the case. The case was considered by the courts. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the White Paper that we are debating today proposes a new approach to offences of serious violence. I hope that he will give voice to the concern that he has expressed by supporting the proposals in the White Paper.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North–East): The Home Secretary, in his opening remarks, has painted a picture of a beautiful land in which crime levels are decreasing all the time. That situation is not recognisable to most people who live in our towns and cities. What is he doing about the astronomical rate of vehicle crime and the appalling recovery rate of stolen vehicles? We have had nothing but complacency from his Department in this regard.

Mr. Howard: I am most interested in the example that the hon. Gentleman cited. Vehicle crime is one of the categories of crime that has shown one of the biggest reductions in recent years. The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) on the Labour Front Bench has just laughed. If he thinks that people do not report the fact that their car has been stolen, he is living in cloud cuckoo land. The recorded figures show that there were more than 80,000 fewer instances of vehicle theft over the past two years. That is a genuine figure. Everyone reports the fact that their car has been stolen. Labour Members refuse to accept the facts and they refuse to accept the figures that are self-evidently correct.

Mr. D. N. Campbell–Savours (Workington): I have been the subject of three offences in the past four years. The first instance was a theft that occurred in the House of Commons, but no action was taken; the second instance involved someone attempting to interfere with my credit card, which I reported to the police in south London, but no action was taken; and on the third occasion someone broke into my vehicle. What did I do on that occasion? Nothing—it is a waste of time. Millions of people throughout the country agree with me. The figures are fraudulent, they mean nothing and the public know the truth.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman has manifestly failed to deal with the precise point that I made: no one fails to report the fact that their car has been stolen. Over the past two years, there have been more than 80,000 fewer recorded instances of vehicle theft. That is a clear demonstration that we are making progress in the fight against crime. Of course we have not eliminated crime and of course, alas, hon. Members and others will still be the victims of crime. I am addressing—in the White Paper that we are debating today and in the other steps that we are taking to fight crime—the Government's strategy to make further progress in the fight against crime because it needs to be made.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does the Home Secretary agree with me that one of the reasons—perhaps a significant reason—for the decline in reported crime is that there are currently 1 million fewer young men aged under 25 than there were 20 years ago? Most crime is committed by young men under the age of 25.

Mr. Howard: No, I do not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. The Government have looked at the extent to which demographic changes of that kind might have contributed to the fall in recorded crime over the past three years. Any effect that that might have had is small when compared with the more than 8 per cent. reduction in crime that we have seen over the past three years. I am happy to write to the hon. and learned Gentleman with the precise figures.

I must now make some progress. Before that series of ill-timed and ill-considered interventions, I referred to the additional powers that we have given to the police. In addition to those extra powers, the police should soon have the new powers of arrest relating to knife carrying provided by the legislation introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), which is currently passing through Parliament with Government support.

However, I believe that the public need greater protection from serious, dangerous and persistent offenders. That is what the radical new proposals set out in the White Paper are designed to achieve. The proposals are targeted at rapists, persistent burglars, dealers in hard drugs and other criminals who time and again commit offences that are of particular concern to the public.

The sentencing measures are part of a wider package. Earlier this week, I announced proposals for better ways of safeguarding the public—especially children—against sex offenders. Today I am publishing a White Paper, "On the Record", which sets out our proposals for new arrangements for accessing criminal records in England and Wales. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will bring forward similar proposals for Scotland.

The police currently carry out more than a million checks each year, of which 600,000 are for child protection purposes. Extending access to checks under the current arrangements would mean not only increasing the burden of work on the police but taking valuable resources away from core policing activities. We therefore propose to establish a criminal records agency which will relieve the police of much of that work. The agency will be self-financing on the basis of fees paid for checks. Individuals will be responsible for meeting the cost of any check undertaken of them, and charges will be kept as low as possible.

In future there will be three different types of checks. The first will be in a new criminal conviction certificate which will be available only to the individuals concerned. It will show any convictions that are held at a national level and are not "spent" under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.

The second is a "full" check. It will be available for those who are in occupations that are exceptions to the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act, such as doctors and teachers. Both the individual and the employer will receive information as a result of that check. The information disclosed will include those convictions that are "spent" under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act and any cautions that are recorded at a national level. Employers who wish those checks to be undertaken will be required to register with the agency and to agree to abide by a code of practice that will ensure that proper procedures are followed in handling criminal record information. We shall consult about the contents of the code of practice.

The third type of check is an "enhanced" check. It will be available only to those who work on a regular, unsupervised basis with children under the age of 18 and to those who apply for gaming, betting and lottery licences. In addition to a "full" check, it will include a check of local police records for minor convictions, cautions and any relevant non-conviction information about the applicant. We have given particular thought to the issue and we have decided that, on balance, it is right to continue to provide non-conviction information. However, we have recognised the need to have clear guidance about both the information and the circumstances in which it can be disclosed.

The latter provision will cover information that can be fully substantiated by the police and will be released only on the authority of a senior police officer. It will be given to the individual as well as to the employer and the employer must decide its relevance to the post in question. The only time that an individual will not be told about any information that is released to an employer is when it might prejudice a current police investigation.

The White Paper proposals place no new requirement upon any employer to seek a criminal record check, and checks will be mandatory only when there is an existing statutory requirement—for example, in cases of licensing. I believe that the proposals will play a valuable role in our strategy of protecting the public from crime.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): The Home Secretary referred to provisions for employers. Has he considered the case of voluntary organisations which do not employ their volunteers who often work in very sensitive areas with young children and other vulnerable groups? Will he extend the access provision to such organisations so that they may check on their volunteers?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention, and there is a strong case for extending the checks in the way that she suggests. Before I leave that point, I should add that the proposals in the White Paper that we have published today have been warmly welcomed by the police. I have just received a press release issued by the Police Superintendents Association of England and Wales, which welcomes the measures and says that they "may even deter criminals who will be aware that they will not be able to hide their criminal activities from potential employers and is therefore another measure which puts victims first put and underpins the commitment to protecting the public."

[Mr. Howard]

[Interruption.] I note that the views of the association are apparently a subject for ribaldry for Opposition Back Benchers.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I welcome the enormous and good work that my right hon. and learned Friend is doing and I also welcome the fact that non-conviction information will be carried for certain individuals and organisations who look after children. What right of appeal will there be for an organisation that is refused information by a senior police officer if it feels that that information is crucial, although it does not involve convictions, for an applicant who may be employed to look after children in its care?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. The question of appeal is mentioned in the White Paper and the details of that important matter are set out there.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Before the Secretary of State leaves the subject of criminal records, will he confirm that the White Paper contains no proposals to implement the Home Affairs Select Committee's unanimous recommendation for the proper regulation of the private security industry, and that the effect is to create a huge, gaping loophole in the arrangements? The proposals, as I read them, may allow private security employers to weed out the crooks who work for private security firms, but they will do nothing to weed out the crooks who own and operate some of those private security firms.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Select Committee's proposals on the private security industry are still under consideration. The measures set out in White Paper today will be of considerable assistance and relevance in the context of that industry, and not merely in the way suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The proposals will enable firms that are not involved in the industry, but which employ people for security purposes, to carry out checks, and that will be a considerable safeguard. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that.

I turn now to our sentencing proposals. They are under three main headings. The first is "Honesty in sentencing". The public are outraged when someone sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment is released after four or five years or when someone sentenced to seven days' imprisonment is released after one night. I agree with the former Lord Chief Justice, Lord Taylor, who recently said that those arrangements "have the appearance of a charade with everyone engaged in a calculation of how much less than the pronounced sentence will actually be served".

I therefore propose that the sentence served should bear a much closer relationship to the sentence passed by the court.

Prisoners who behave well and co-operate should be able to earn up to 20 per cent. off their sentence. Everyone else will have to serve their sentences in full. That will create an incentive for prisoners to behave well while in prison. Governors will retain the power to take away time earned as a sanction for disciplinary offences—the Opposition's Front-Bench spokesman in another place, in the debate on 23 May, was quite wrong to suggest that governors would be, as she put it, stripped of that power.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The Home Secretary has selectively called in aid the views of the former Lord Chief Justice, Lord Taylor. Has the Home Secretary also considered the broader view taken by the Lord Chief Justice of his White Paper, when he said that grave consequences would follow if the main proposals were put into effect? The Home Secretary mentioned one sentence from the Lord Chief Justice, but does he accept the broad attack on the totality of his proposals?

Mr. Howard: I do not think that it is a secret that, on the other proposals in the White Paper, the former Lord Chief Justice and I have different views. Similarly, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is seriously suggesting that I was attempting to conceal that from the House or the world. It may be of interest to note that in this instance the former Lord Chief Justice and I are happily in agreement.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Is it not arrogant to introduce the name of the former Lord Chief Justice in such a way when the Home Secretary knows that many of us have come to the Chamber to listen to what he has to say? It is our first opportunity to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman respond to the final speech of the former Lord Chief Justice in another place, during which he more or less said that he had no confidence in a Home Secretary who should introduce such measures based on such "flimsy and dubious research".

Mr. Howard: I am coming to the rest of my proposals, if the hon. Gentleman will contain himself. I will deal with them in detail. The hon. Gentleman has misquoted the former Lord Chief Justice, but there is no secret that the former Lord Chief Justice—[Interruption.] He criticised the proposals but he did not—

Mr. Sheerman: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Home Secretary says that I have misquoted the former Lord Chief Justice. He said in column 1025 of the Official Report of another place on 23 May

"that never in the history of our criminal law"—

Madam Speaker: Order. It is not a point of order if the hon. Gentleman merely repeats what he said earlier. He should contain himself and make a speech later.

Mr. Howard: I shall come to my other proposals and to the evidence for them. I hope that today we shall have rather less equivocal language from those who occupy the Opposition Front Bench than we have had so far.

First, I shall deal with honesty in sentencing. The White Paper makes it clear that the courts will be expected when passing sentence to take account of the abolition of parole and changes in early-release arrangements. That could be achieved either by a practice direction, if the Lord Chief Justice decided that it would be appropriate to issue such a direction, or by specific statutory provision. The Government therefore do not intend or expect the proposal to result in a general increase in sentences actually served. Its purpose, as I have made clear from the outset, is to introduce greater honesty and clarity into the sentencing process and to restore credibility to the sentence passed by the court.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Howard: I have already given way once to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I have no doubt that he will be able to make his speech in due course.

The second key element of my proposals is that anyone convicted for the second time of a serious sexual or violent offence should receive an automatic life sentence unless there are genuinely exceptional circumstances. The offences covered by this proposal would include, among others, rape, attempted rape, attempted murder, manslaughter and the most serious woundings. The purpose of the proposal is to ensure that no one who comes into the category will be released until an assessment has been made of whether he or she still poses a risk to the public.

Life imprisonment is, of course, already the maximum penalty for serious violent and sexual offences such as rape and attempted murder. In 1994, however, 217 offenders were convicted of a serious violent or sexual offence having previously been convicted of at least one similar offence, and only 10 of them were sentenced to life imprisonment. Again in 1994, about 40 violent or sexual crimes were committed by offenders who had already been convicted of two such offences. The Government's proposals mean that in future such offenders would be released if, and only if, there had been an assessment that it was safe for them to be released. Those who are released will remain on licence and subject to recall for the rest of their lives.

The third element of our proposals is that the courts should be required to impose a minimum prison sentence on offenders who are convicted of domestic burglary or dealing in hard drugs who have two previous convictions for similar offences. It is proposed in the White Paper that there should be a minimum sentence on third conviction of three years in the case of domestic burglary and seven years in relation to drug trafficking offences. The courts will have discretion to set aside the mandatory penalty in genuinely exceptional circumstances and to impose a higher sentence than the mandatory minimum in appropriate cases.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Home Secretary agree that, in dealing with burglaries, attention should be directed on those who habitually receive stolen goods and thereby encourage others to burgle?

Mr. Howard: I do indeed agree with the hon. Gentleman. The fact that a particular offence does not come within the very precisely targeted category that has been selected for mandatory minimum sentences does not, of course, mean that the courts should pass a life sentence in those cases. The hon. Gentleman has correctly identified a category that will no doubt receive the attention of the courts where appropriate.

Persistent burglars and drug dealers are a menace to society, and they should know that if they continue to offend they will go to prison for a long time. In too many cases, non-custodial sentences or very short prison sentences are imposed on burglars who have numerous previous convictions. It just cannot be right that burglars before the court for their seventh or subsequent conviction are getting average sentences of 19 months—serving perhaps 10 months. That is only a few months longer than the 15 or 16 months—serving perhaps eight months—of first offenders who are sent to prison. Stiff minimum sentences will provide a real deterrent to persistent offenders and ensure that those who continue to offend receive the punishment that they so richly deserve.

I do not accept that these proposals encroach improperly on judicial independence. It has always been Parliament's responsibility to set the statutory framework for sentencing, and for judges to exercise their discretion within that framework.

It has been argued that mandatory sentences will not work because it is the certainty of conviction that deters offenders, not the severity of sentence. But improving detection rates and imposing stiffer sentences are not alternatives, they are complementary. The most effective deterrent is to have both. The police are taking action to improve detection rates in a number of ways, for example, by targeting known and persistent offenders. The Government's proposals will back that up. Bringing persistent burglars back before the courts time and time again is useless if the sentence imposed is one that they can regard as a minor occupational hazard in their chosen career.

Ros Burnett of Oxford university, in a study entitled "The Dynamics of Recidivism", found on the basis of interviews with prisoners that > "Avoidance of imprisonment was the most frequently mentioned reason for not wanting to re-offend".

Under our proposals, persistent offenders will know that they will get a stiff sentence if they persist in offending.

The public rightly expect protection from serious, dangerous and persistent offenders. The proposals that I have outlined are carefully targeted at crimes of particular concern to the public—serious sex and violent offences, domestic burglary, and dealing in hard drugs. The Government believe that urgent action is required to provide a real deterrent to such offenders; to punish severely those who continue to offend regardless; and above all to protect the public from their activities. The White Paper "Protecting the Public", and our new proposals for sex offenders and for making better preventive use of criminal records, are further steps towards protecting the public in that way.

I now deal with the position taken by the Opposition parties. I am surprised that the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who is deputy leader of the Labour party, is not present for the debate, as his ambitions to become shadow Home Secretary are famous, and this would have been the perfect opportunity for him to size up the Home Affairs portfolio and to learn from the many mistakes of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw).

The hon Gentleman's approach to policy making consists of a four-stage process typical of the manic depressive. The first is the manic phase. He hears about someone else's idea. "That's a good one," he says, skipping excitedly around his room. During the second stage there is a frenzy of activity. He does not need anything more than Snopake, a photocopier and a fax machine—the usual tools of trade of the bottom-of-the-market plagiarist. The third stage consists of panic as the plan unravels. Another Straw fiasco is complete. That leads to the final stage—deep depression.

Let us take the teenage curfew saga as a classic example. President Clinton makes a speech on teenage curfews. The hon. Gentleman gets to work within hours. This is a golden opportunity. He can see the headlines now: "Straw to crack down on kids". "Tony will be pleased,' he says to himself. "My job in the shadow Cabinet is safe after all."

The trouble is that the hon. Gentleman's colleague, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), had already condemned the idea as "utter and complete nonsense", and the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said the following day:

"I'm not sure that a curfew would be a workable solution."

They were not alone. The chief constable of Gloucestershire, speaking as the representative of the Association of Chief Police Officers, said:

"I think there are some huge practical difficulties."

In the face of that barrage, the hon. Gentleman back-tracked rapidly.

Mr. Donald Anderson: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Given your traditional role of protector of the House, would it be appropriate for you to remind the Home Secretary that he is not at a Conservative party conference now?

Madam Speaker: That is not really a point of order for me. I am sure that the Home Secretary is well aware of where he is at the present time.

Mr. Howard: I understand the discomfort of members of the Labour party. I know that they do not want to hear all this. Let me remind them, however, of what the hon. Member for Blackburn told the Sunday Times. He said:

"The age groups affected could be people up to age 16."

I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman stands by that quote; perhaps he will enlighten us now. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] I understand why the hon. Gentleman does not wish to enlighten us. The next day, the line was completely different. "We are not thinking about the under-16s," the hon. Gentleman said. He told The Guardian:

"We are thinking about the under 10s possibly being off the streets by 9.00 pm".

What had started as a war on teenage crime ended as an attempt to protect the under-10s from themselves, all in 24 hours flat.

The hon. Gentleman tried one last desperate throw. We want to hear more about this: we want to hear the answer. A nationwide search was undertaken to identify a police force that might be willing to undertake a pilot scheme, and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris) was recruited to the cause. The Guardian reported that the West Midlands police were willing to start a pilot scheme; that was in The Guardian, so it must be true. A meeting was to be held between the police and the hon. Member for Yardley, after which the details would be announced. The meeting took place on 12 June, but for some unaccountable reason nothing has been heard from the hon. Gentleman or the hon. Lady since. Could that be because no plans for a curfew were agreed after all, or because there was little or no support for the hon. Gentleman's ideas? I think we should be told, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will deal with that point when he replies.

Mr. Don Touhig (Islwyn): As the Home Secretary is quoting from newspapers, may I ask whether he saw a piece in The Independent last week which said that the measure that he is describing was really an attempt to regain the initiative as a result of Labour's efforts? Is the Home Secretary, in fact, trying desperately to paper over the cracks in the Conservative party?

Mr. Howard: I will leave the hon. Gentleman to take what comfort he may from The Independent.

Mr. Straw: Perhaps the Home Secretary would also like to take some comfort, from someone whom he has already quoted—the president of the Police Superintendents Association, Mr. Brian Mackenzie. The Home Secretary may have missed it, but Mr. Mackenzie said of our proposals:

"Police superintendents have been complaining bitterly over the last few years about juveniles running wild and causing problems. The proposals from Jack Straw are one of a range of measures well worth considering. I am delighted that responsible authorities are looking at it."

Mr. Howard: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was unable to answer either of the specific and direct questions that I had put to him a few moments before. I doubt very much that, when the president of the Police Superintendents Association referred to "juveniles", he was referring to the under-10s. He may have been misled by the report in the Sunday Times. He probably did not appreciate that, within 24 hours, the hon. Gentleman would back-track and change his proposals for dealing with the under-16s to a proposal to protect the under-10s from themselves.

There has been a great deal of debate about my proposals on sentencing since I first outlined them last October. Strong views have been expressed both for and against those proposals. The Labour party's reaction has been instructive.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): The Home Secretary referred to an article in The Guardian about an initiative taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris) and asked what had become of it. He might be interested to know that I was with my hon. Friend when she met West Midlands police. We met a group of local residents in her constituency. West Midlands police said that our proposals for under-10-year-olds were perfectly plausible and that it would work with the local authority to introduce them in a particular part of her constituency. That is what became of the proposal. Perhaps the Home Secretary will tell us whether he thinks it is a good thing for children under 10 to be out on the street late at night.

Mr. Howard: Of course I do not. If the police find youngsters on the street in need of protection, they already have powers to take the youngsters to a safe place. The hon. Gentleman did not tell us is whether the pilot scheme that he and the hon. Member for Yardley asked West Midlands police to carry out in Yardley is to take place.

Mr. Howarth: Yes.

Mr. Howard: Instead of making sedentary comments, will the hon. Gentleman state from the Dispatch Box that a pilot proposal will take place, because that is not the information that I have received from West Midlands police.

Mr. Howarth: I repeat that we held discussions with West Midlands police.

Mr. Howard: Is a scheme going to take place?

Mr. Howarth: The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked me to answer his question, so perhaps he will be courteous enough to allow me to do so. Discussions have subsequently been held with Birmingham city council. The police and the council are now working on a proposal for a specific part of the Yardley constituency to see whether a pilot curfew for under-10s could be made to work. I understand—I have no reason to believe otherwise—that there is every reason to believe that the pilot project will go ahead.

Unless the Home Secretary has some evidence to the contrary, perhaps he will explain why the local residents, police officers and members of the local authority we met did not feel that the powers available to the police and local authority were sufficient to stop young children under 10 being out on the streets to no useful purpose late at night. If he cannot explain that, we must assume that he supports under-10s being on the street late at night.

Mr. Howard: I have just explained what powers already exist. The hon. Gentleman has manifestly failed to repeat from the Dispatch Box the words that he was using from a sedentary position a few moments ago. He and the hon. Member for Yardley told The Guardian that a pilot scheme would take place. We have heard nothing since. My information from West Midlands police is that no pilot scheme will take place; the House will draw its own conclusions from the hon. Gentleman's intervention from the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I am sure that the Home Secretary will forgive me if I take him back to the subject of the debate. Has he had an opportunity to study what the senior judges, including Lord Justice Taylor, have said about the dangers inherent in life sentences being imposed in the manner proposed by the White Paper—the dangers to the victim himself or, more probably, herself?

Mr. Howard: Of course I have studied that, but I do not accept the views that have been expressed, because the arguments advanced in another place are arguments against any life sentence. If the hon. Gentleman accepts those views, perhaps he will tell the House whether he is against any life sentence. If that line of argument is accepted, there is an incentive for the offender to take more serious action and even to kill.

The truth is that, when someone commits a rape, he is most unlikely to be in the state of mind that will lead him to make a cold and calculating decision about what his next act should be. If he is in that state of mind and makes such a cold and calculating decision, he will know perfectly well that, if caught and convicted, when the judge fixes the tariff part of the life sentence, it is likely to be a different tariff for rape than for murder. That will be something to be taken into account in planning his behaviour. If he behaves in that cold and calculating way, which is extremely unlikely, he will know that there continues to be a deterrent against further serious criminal conduct.

When I announced my proposals, colleagues of the hon. Member for Blackburn rushed to condemn them one after another. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) called them "daft". The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth called them a "farce". Labour's Front-Bench spokesman in the other place called my proposals "deplorable" and hoped that the next Session was sufficiently curtailed to make it impossible for my proposals to become law. Last month, Lord Williams of Mostyn, another Labour Front-Bench spokesman in the other place, called minimum sentences "a perversion of justice". Those statements could not be clearer.

As Labour is root and branch opposed to my proposals, why does the hon. Member for Blackburn find it so hard to echo that aggressive rhetoric in the House? Why does he confine himself to such weasel words? I will tell the House why the hon. Gentleman has thus far been so muted—because he is under orders from the Leader of the Opposition to avoid any headline saying "Labour opposes tough action on crime". I serve notice on the hon. Gentleman that his tactics are transparent and will fail.

At least the Liberal Democrats are honest. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said that I should be ashamed of my proposals. Let me answer him directly. I shall never be ashamed of proposing greater protection for the public from dangerous criminals. I shall never be ashamed of proposing tough deterrent sentences for career burglars and hard-drug dealers. I shall never be ashamed of bringing greater honesty to the sentencing process. The police overwhelmingly support those proposals, and so do the public. I warn the hon. and learned Gentleman that his parliamentary candidates will regret his remarks, even if he does not.

The Labour party opposes statutory minimum sentences for burglars and drug dealers, mandatory life sentences for dangerous violent criminals and the ending of automatic early release from prison. Labour will not support our proposals in the Division tonight and will do its best to stop them becoming law. We will make sure that the public understand that a Labour Government would not introduce those proposals. Only this Government can be trusted to do so. Only this Government genuinely believe that tough action is needed to protect the public. Only this Government will take that action. The White Paper provides for that, and I commend it to the House.

4.32 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to move, to leave out from House to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

'notes that given the doubling of crime since 1979, the record of Her Majesty's Government on crime is the worst of any British administration since the war and the worst record of 16 western countries surveyed by the Home Office; further notes that the proposals contained in the White Paper "Protecting the Public" (Cm 3190) represent a complete reversal of the sentencing policies of Her Majesty's Government as contained in the Criminal Justice Act 1991; and believes that the comprehensive proposals of Her Majesty's Opposition to be tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime will be far more effective in tackling crime and disorder in England and Wales, and in ensuring tough and appropriate sentences for serious or persistent criminals within a proper framework of justice.'.

The Home Secretary spoke for 42 minutes. The House has listened to one of the most puerile and pathetic speeches ever from the right hon. and learned Gentleman, which demeaned his high office. Of those 42 minutes, the Home Secretary devoted fewer than 10 to the ostensible subject of the debate. He devoted the rest of his speech to a White Paper published today, so that he could avoid publicity about proposals that are so embarrassing to him, and to making insults of the kind we are so used to hearing from the Home Secretary.

This is Crime Week but, under this Government, every week is crime week for the British people. So far this week, the British public have been the victims of 150,000 criminal offences—50,000 a day, according to Home Office estimates in the British crime survey.

There was a time when crime happened to someone else. In 1971, The Times commented how, after six years of Labour Governments, crime had simply dropped off the political agenda. Today, however—when the Conservative party has been in power for 20 of the past 25 years—crime, the fear of crime and the experience of crime has affected almost everyone in the land.

Crime has fractured communities. It has forced people to change the way in which they live, and it has forced up the cost of living. Insurance premiums for cars and homes have rocketed far above the rate of inflation since 1979.

The Government's record on crime is the worst of any British Administration since the war, and the worst of any western Government. Crime under the Tories has risen twice as fast as it did under Labour. Between 1987 and 1993, crime in England and Wales rose further and faster than in any of 16 western countries surveyed by the Home Office.

People are not troubled only by specific recorded crime—they are troubled by disorder, loutish behaviour, graffiti, criminal damage and anti-social behaviour by neighbours. In 1994-95, incidents of disorder recorded by the police rose 12 per cent. in a single year.

Recorded crime has doubled in the past 17 years, yet, for all the bluster we heard from the Secretary of State, the system for catching, punishing and deterring criminals in that 17 years has gone into reverse. The number of people convicted or cautioned was lower in 1995 than it was in 1979.

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): In view of the hon. Gentleman's loud concern about the crime rate, does he still think that he was right to vote against allowing the Attorney-General the power to appeal against soft sentences?

Mr. Straw: Opposition Members will take no lectures from the Conservative party, which has presided over record increases of crime. Nor will we take any lectures on voting records, as the hon. Gentleman voted to prevent many victims of crime from receiving decent compensation and, in 1988, the Secretary of State voted against a ban proposed by the Opposition to prevent youngsters under 16 from purchasing knives.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The Home Secretary ducked that issue in his speech. Not only did he vote in 1988 against restrictions on the sale of knives to those under 16, but the previous Home Secretary and the Minister under him also objected to an Opposition proposal that would have restricted the sale of arms and imitation firearms by post.

We note that, at Dunblane—I hope that the Home Secretary is listening—the guns were obtained by post. We were pointing out that possibility—following Hungerford—in that proposal. The real question for the Home Secretary is, why did the Government oppose those measures then, and why did they specifically vote against restricting knives for 16-year-olds?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is of course right. In the debates during the passage of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, in which my hon. Friend took such an important part, there were many occasions on which Ministers either opposed what we were doing or complimented us on the improvements that we had made to it.

For some of the most serious criminal offences, the way in which the gap has widened between crimes committed and offenders convicted since 1979 has been alarming. In 1980, almost four in 10 recorded rapes resulted in conviction. By 1994, the proportion had dropped to just one in 10. In 1980, 9 per cent. of domestic burglaries resulted in conviction. By 1994, the proportion was down to 3 per cent.

In the space of five years, between 1989 and 1994, the number of violent crimes rose by a quarter, while the number of convictions fell by a third. Even when someone finally gets to court, the sentence they receive may depend as much on the chance of where they are tried as on the severity of the offence. The proportion of indictable offences tried in magistrates courts that lead to a prison sentence varies by a factor of 10. In the Staffordshire, Moorlands court, one in six defendants end up inside; but in the Maidenhead court the proportion is one in 66.

The lack of consistency between courts is matched by a lack of progression in sentencing. The fact—according to parliamentary answers given to me by the Secretary of State—that someone imprisoned for domestic burglary is given the same term of 15 months on the first, second or third conviction is bizarre. Even odder is the fact that, according to the Government's own figures, the prison term for a third conviction for drug dealing, at 30 months, is two months shorter than that for a first offence.

As the public's concern about crime has risen, and public confidence in the Government's ability to do anything about it has fallen, so the Government's response has been a blizzard of legislation on criminal justice. There have been 33 separate measures for England and Wales since 1979—more Bills on criminal justice in the past 17 years than in the previous 50.

It would be one thing if each of those Bills had been carefully prepared and they were consistent one with another. Instead, some have signalled sudden lurches in policy that, far from advancing the fight against crime, have made it more difficult. As the outgoing Lord Chief Justice, Lord Taylor, commented in his King's college lecture in March:

"the proper balance between continuity and change is in dire danger . . . the criminal law should not be subject to arbitrary change by the powers that be, or to the vagaries of fashion".

Overall, not least as a result of that torrent of legislation, the criminal justice processes in this country are now in chronic crisis, with rising costs, increasing delay and plummeting public satisfaction.

This year, the Secretary of State told readers of The Sun that the current sentencing system and criminal justice process

"is a farce and makes a mockery of the courts."

The figures that I have produced today show that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was right about that, if about little else.

The question is: who has been responsible for that "farce" and that "mockery"? Was it the Lord Chief Justice and his judicial colleagues who devised the system? Was it the Labour party, or the Liberal Democrats? Or was it someone else? Even today, a Conservative candidate writing in The Times says that the people to blame for the mess are "officialdom", as though each one of the Secretary of State's predecessors as Home Secretary, such as the present Chancellor of the Exchequer or the distinguished former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), had been mere putty in the hands of his civil servants.

It is not the officials who are to blame, nor the judges, but this Government, this Prime Minister and this Secretary of State. The current sentencing system is less than five years old. It was laid down by the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which was pushed through the House by Conservative Ministers. The very people who now claim that the system is a mockery and a farce were the architects of that system in the first place.

How dare the Secretary of State blame others for the farce and the mockery of the current sentencing system, when it is he and his ministerial colleagues who are principally to blame? It is they who are the guilty men and women, and it is they who should admit that the White Paper represents a rejection of almost everything that the Conservative party has done on sentencing in the past 17 years.

The Secretary of State now calls for honesty in sentencing. What an admission that is about the past 17 years of sentencing policy under the Conservatives.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Would it be fair to characterise the Home Secretary as the Pol Pot of British politics, always pretending to return to "year zero" at successive party conferences, although to find out the truth we have only to go back as far as the White Paper of 1990 and the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which is now being totally erased? We are not in year zero; the buck stops with the Home Secretary.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend asks whether it would be fair to characterise the Home Secretary in that way. It may not be fair, but it would certainly be true.

Mr. Peter Butler (Milton Keynes, North-East): If the hon. Gentleman is right to claim that the present proposals reverse the Criminal Justice Act 1991, and he opposed that, why does he also oppose the reversal of it?

Mr. Straw: Well—[Laughter.] The hon. Gentleman is, I know, a difficult man, and I did not quite follow the logic of his question. What he should worry about more when he talks to his constituents is the fact that he too voted to cut compensation for victims, and also the fact that recorded crime in his constituency since 1979—not since year zero—has increased by 141 per cent., one of the largest increases anywhere in the country.

Mr. Sweeney: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. I need to turn to the other important White Paper, which the Secretary of State published today.

As I said, it is quite remarkable that, given the slackness of the parliamentary timetable and all the days and weeks that the Secretary of State could have chosen in which to publicise, to great effect for himself, the White Paper "On the Record" about the Government's proposals for access to criminal records, he chooses to do it today and hijack his speech about another White Paper, "Protecting the Public", on which he managed to spend only 10 minutes.

When the House, at the Opposition's instigation, debated the private security industry, there was widespread demand from Members on both sides for arrangements for access to criminal records to be reformed. It is clearly necessary for employers to be aware of the criminal records of those they seek to employ in positions of trust, and crucial that the greatest possible protection is available in respect of children. In the area of child sexual abuse, there is a conflict between the needs of children and the civil liberties of suspected abusers. In our judgment, where there is a serious risk to children, their needs must always prevail.

For those working outside such sensitive areas, we must ensure that any system balances the needs of employers, and through them the public, with the rehabilitation of offenders. As the Government said in their Green Paper on criminal records in 1993:

"common sense suggests that an ex-offender with suitable work is less likely to reoffend than one who is unemployed".

We shall examine the White Paper very carefully to ensure that it achieves the proper balance.

As I said in an intervention on the Secretary of State, the White Paper is seriously deficient in its proposals for dealing with the private security industry. In its 1995 report, the Select Committee on Home Affairs was clear that the vetting of potential employees was not enough to protect the public from totally unregulated private patrols or other private security companies which "prey on the fears of vulnerable people."

The Government must accept the arguments of the police, the overwhelming majority of companies in the private security industry—they are desperate for proper regulation because of the way in which their reputations are besmirched by the crooks—the Home Affairs Committee and the Labour party, and legislate to regulate the industry.

I have here a copy of the Carlisle News and Star, which I understand circulates in the constituency of the Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean).

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): I never buy it.

Mr. Straw: The Minister would do better if he did buy it, because he might learn something.

An article in that paper is headed "'Gangster' is Security Man—City crook a security guard on homes site". The article talks about Aaron Giacopazzi, one of the city's best known criminals, who has been taken on by Lowther Construction to guard a building site. The deputy managing director of the company says in the article:

"'It isn't our normal policy to use convicted criminals."

The Government's proposals provide huge loopholes for people such as Mr. Aaron Giacopazzi. The security firm might be perfectly legitimate. If that were so, his record would be vetted and he would not be employed by it. But there is nothing to stop that man, who is a great entrepreneur and building a £1.5 million development with who knows whose money, setting up his own security firm. He would certainly not vet himself.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): Does my hon. Friend realise that Mr. Giacopazzi has since been arrested on a drugs charge but that the company, being very generous, now employs his father? [Laughter.] And his godfather!

Mr. Straw: That makes our point very strongly.

Mr. Howard: What is the point?

Mr. Straw: The point is very simple. Members of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, which is chaired by the Home Secretary's very close friend, the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence), unanimously recommended that the private security industry—employers as well as employees—should be properly regulated by statute. Ministers, because of their obsession with deregulation, have persistently refused to do so.

The other White Paper that we are debating today, "Protecting the Public", contains three principal proposals: for so-called "honesty in sentencing"; for indeterminate sentences for repeat rapists and perpetrators of serious violence; and for automatic determinate sentences for persistent burglars and drug dealers. I shall deal with each of those in turn.

As I have already made clear, we support the principle of honesty in sentencing. The public have a right to know what is being done on their behalf. On the question how the proposal should be put into practice, I have already suggested that courts should give details of the minimum and maximum period that could be served under the term they hand down, and the earliest release date. In that way, what is now called a four-year sentence would, in future, be described more correctly as a two to four-year sentence. Transparency would be introduced, without having to turn the rest of the system upside down.

The Home Secretary proposes a more complicated change to arrive at the same result, while asserting that he does not expect his proposals "to result in a general increase in the period of time that offenders serve in prison".

We can examine the details of the alternative proposals in Standing Committee if and when a crime Bill comes before the House during the rest of this Parliament.

It already appears—I should be glad if the Minister would deal with this in his reply—that the Secretary of State's preferred arrangement might have one perverse effect, which is that some prisoners may be subject to supervision after their release for much less time than under the present regime.

We also support in principle the proposal for indeterminate sentences for repeat rapists and others convicted of serious sexual offences. Of all crimes, apart from homicide, serious sexual offences can do the greatest long-term harm to the victim, both psychological as well as physical. Those who offend often have a high propensity to reoffend, and, as I pointed out in a detailed paper on sentencing that I published in March, an official committee—the Butler committee—looked at the issue of serious sexual offenders 21 years ago and concluded that there should be available a system of indeterminate reviewable sentences for such repeat sexual offenders.

The Secretary of State proposes that all repeat rapists and serious sexual offenders should receive an indeterminate life sentence. Since "life" is not intended by the White Paper generally to mean life in those cases, there might be advantage in having a separate sentencing regime for those people, unless the court, for particular reasons, gave out a life sentence. That matter can be examined in Committee in due course.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the Butler committee was saying that there should be mandatory reviewable life sentences? Does he not think it sufficient to give judges the power to sentence to life imprisonment and the encouragement of knowing that those sentences would be effective?

Mr. Straw: We have to disagree about this. The Butler committee recommended that there should be a system of indeterminate, reviewable sentences—

Mr. Carlile: Not mandatory.

Mr. Straw: No, I will come to that. The committee said that they should be available for first offences as well as for second or subsequent ones. As I recall—I have read the report—the committee said that there should be a presumption in favour of an automatic indeterminate sentence where there was a second conviction.

What we are proposing and what the Government are proposing for serious sex offenders amount to the same thing: that, because of the danger of reoffending, which must be patently apparent when someone has already offended twice, a decision to release the individual should be made only when it is safe to do so.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I have been listening to what the hon. Gentleman has been saying, which, as I understand it, is that he accepts the principle of honesty in sentencing and the principle that there should be indeterminate sentences for repeat offenders involved in serious sex offences. If that principle is right for England, why is the Labour party opposing it in Scotland?

Mr. Straw: Of all the people to ask that question it is the Secretary of State for Scotland. I have with me the Scottish Office White Paper dealing with crime and punishment. I have read this—it was only a cursory glance, and I am open to correction—but I cannot find any reference to automatic minimum sentences for drug dealers and repeat burglars. Have I missed something? Perhaps the Secretary of State could tell me.

Mr. Forsyth: The question that I put to the hon. Gentleman was about the Labour party's policy—[Interruption.] I will happily deal with the hon. Gentleman's point in exchange for him answering my question. I asked about the Labour party's policy. If its policy is that the principle of honesty in sentencing is right and that the principle of indeterminate sentences for repeat offenders is right, why should that principle be different north of the border?

This is a fundamental issue, and I cannot for the life of me see why it should be different north and south of the border. As far as the Government are concerned, on both these matters, these principles apply throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Straw: I was right in the conclusions that I drew from a cursory reading of the White Paper. The huge inconsistency is not between our hon. Friends who represent Scotland and those of us who represent England and Wales; the inconsistency is between these two Secretaries of State. As far as I can see, the Secretary of State is making no proposals for automatic minimum sentences for drug dealers and for burglars.

Mr. Forsyth: I was listening to the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I was agreeing with him about the matter of principle. If he is saying that the Labour party accepts the principle of honesty in sentencing and the principle of mandatory sentences for repeat sex offenders, he is in the same position as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I. We agree on these matters. It is the Labour party that has split north and south of the border. Why are the principles on these matters different north and south of the border?

Mr. Straw: This is pretty desperate. I have offered the right hon. Gentleman two chances.

I have had the benefit of reading the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) in Scotland on Monday. He said:

"Labour is committed to tough sentencing for those who commit serious crimes. We are committed to progression in sentences and to a licence system for sex offenders."—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 17 June 1996; c. 36.]

The Secretary of State may not have noticed, but there are two different legal systems—that in Scotland and that in England and Wales.

Mr. Forsyth: The principle.

Mr. Straw: If there is a principle, I have just read it out. The Secretary of State has signally failed to explain why there is a difference of principle—as there obviously is—between him and his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary when it comes to automatic minimum sentences for repeat burglars and drug dealers.

The proposals for indeterminate sentences for serious sexual offenders are acceptable to us, not only because they directly address the paramount need to protect the public but because the term actually served will be determined by reference to the nature of the offence and of the offender. The judge will still be required to set a tariff proportionate to the seriousness of the offence. Thereafter, the offender will not be released unless and until the parole board is satisfied that it is safe to release them.

So justice, above all for the victim but also for the offender, is built into this system. These considerations mean that this proposal is wholly different in character and effect from the third of the Home Secretary's proposals, for automatic determinate minimum sentences of three years in the case of domestic burglars on their third conviction, and seven years for drug dealers on their third conviction.

In my response to the Home Secretary's statement on 3 April, I said:

"We do not argue with" the Secretary of State's

"purpose . . . for victims and offenders alike—that people who persistently burgle or deal in hard drugs" should

"receive . . . tough, deterrent . . . sentences."—[Official Report, 3 April 1996; Vol. 275, c. 393.]

The issue is not whether such persistent hardened burglars or drug dealers should receive such tough deterrent sentences, but how that should be achieved.

The problem with the Secretary of State's proposals is that, the more they are exposed to scrutiny, the more it becomes clear that they will not work as he intends. It is a mark of how ill thought through was his original proposal that he has already made one fundamental change from what he told the Conservative party conference in October 1995. Then, at least what he said had the merit of clarity, however crude and impractical the policy might have turned out.

Then, in right hon. and learned Gentleman's desperation to upstage the Secretary of State for Defence in his appeal to the Tory right, the Home Secretary was emphatic. He told the party faithful:

"I've got a simple answer to burglars and dealers in hard drugs who offend again and again and again. If you don't want the time, don't do the crime."

But where are we now? A mere two months later, the Home Secretary had to admit that such a wholly automatic slot-machine system of justice would produce manifest injustice.

So, by December, he had to concede, in an interview in The Law Society's Gazette, that the answer to these drug dealers and burglars would not be as simple as that which he had presented to the Tory party conference, and there would be an escape clause. The clarion call about time and crime had by then become, "If you don't want the time, don't do the crime—save where the courts exercise a discretion to waive the minimum sentences in exceptional cases."

Here we see the central element of the Home Secretary's proposals unravelling, because of the belated acknowledgement that they cannot apply in all cases. What is more, the escape clause to the simple answer that he told the Tory party conference he had has changed again twice. The White Paper shifted from the words that the right hon. and learned Gentleman used in the Law Society's Gazette interview, and now speaks of "genuinely exceptional cases"—as if the adverb "genuinely" adds any clarity to what he means.

[Mr. Straw]

Only last month, the Home Secretary's very close and noble Friend Lord Mackay, the Lord Chancellor, treating these proposals in the White Paper like a piece of stinking fish, said that the precise terms on which the exception will be framed would be a matter for Parliament to determine.

So where is the simple answer now; indeed, where is the complicated answer? The Secretary of State and his colleagues cannot even make up their minds about that. We await the Bill with interest. Who knows what its terms by then will be?

One of the Secretary of State's most trusted colleagues in the House of Commons is the hon. and learned Member for Burton, Chairman of the Home Affairs Select Committee. I am very sorry that he cannot be present today—perhaps this debate was arranged explicitly with that in mind—but, like other members of the Select Committee, he is in the United States examining American penal policy.

When the issue of minimum sentences was debated at length in the House in February 1991, the hon. and learned Gentleman made this wise observation:

"I do not like minimum sentences. They reduce the discretion of the courts, and all who practice in or know anything about the courts realise that human life spans an enormous width and that there are many degrees of blameworthiness . . . Speeches calling for minimum sentences have always been resisted over the years. The Government have resisted the idea of going down this slippery slope, because if one case is allowed as an exception it becomes difficult to refuse other cases"—[Official Report, 20 February 1991; Vol. 186, c. 311-2.]

What a slippery slope it will be! This proposal from the Secretary of State will undoubtedly result in more guilty professional burglars and drug dealers walking free from court. In the United States, the jurisdictions with automatic determinate sentences are jammed up with not-guilty fights—two and a half times as many of them as where the courts have a discretion. More not guilty pleas mean more acquittals.

The Government's White Paper of 1990 said that such a system of minimum determinate sentences

"would . . . result in more acquittals by juries with more guilty men and women going free unjustly as a result"— a point repeated by the former Secretary of State for Education, the right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), when he was a Minister of State at the Home Office.

Today, the Home Secretary quoted some research by an academic at Oxford. It is unusual to hear him quoting research by any academic, let alone one from his own constituency, but we shall leave that aside. He said that the research showed that the avoidance of prison was the greatest deterrent that any system could establish.

We do not need research from Oxford to tell us that. Those of us who have had dealings with criminals know only too well that, on the whole, they do not like being in prison. One of our major complaints about the chaos in to which the Conservatives have plunged the criminal justice system is that not enough serious criminals are being put in prison—

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Come off it.

Mr. Straw: Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that, since 1979—year zero for the British public—the number of recorded crimes has doubled, while the number of people convicted and cautioned for those crimes has dropped by 6 per cent., and the number convicted of any crime has dropped by 33 per cent.? No wonder people are up the wall about this Government's record and complacency.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about the difficulty of securing convictions, why did he vote against our proposals to allow the courts to draw an inference from silence—proposals deliberately designed to increase the number of convictions of the guilty, which are having precisely that effect?

Mr. Straw: We shall take no lectures from the Secretary of State. He voted for the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which he now says makes a mockery of the sentencing system. If he reads the record, he will find that we suggested alternative, constructive proposals based on recommendations made by the royal commission on criminal justice which he and his predecessors established.

The simple fact is that nothing we have heard from the Secretary of State today or at any time since he made his proposals last October has challenged the wisdom of the conclusion reached by the Government in 1990—that automatic minimum determinate sentences would result in more guilty people walking free.

Then there is the issue of timing. What is clear from the White Paper is that the Secretary of State has been deserted by the Chancellor, himself a former Home Secretary, and by most of his other colleagues on this issue. Automatic minimum sentences for repeat burglars will add hugely to the prison population, which is already rising fast. Far from gaining the extra cash needed for this prison expansion, the Secretary of State got rolled over in the last public spending round; and the prison budget is to take a cut in each of the next three years.

Reading the small print of the White Paper, one finds that this much-heralded policy of gaoling repeat burglars will not come into force at all until October 1999. The relevant convictions will not start until after commencement of this part of the Act. So, on the most optimistic assumptions, a prolific burglar may not be affected by the proposal at least until the year 2000.

By now, that notorious clarion call about time and crime, with its "simple answer", should read: "If you don't want the time, don't do the crime—save where the court exercises its discretion to waive the minimum sentence in genuinely exceptional cases, and in any case not until the start of the next millennium." That is hardly what the public would call honest or straightforward.

The public cannot wait another four years for an effective sentencing system that ensures proper consistency and progression. We need a criminal justice system that is swift, efficient and consistent, and that ensures proper progression for all repeat offenders—not just drug dealers and domestic burglars.

The way to achieve that is, as Labour has proposed, by imposing a clear duty on the Court of Appeal to lay down clear guidance for all the main categories of offence, and to consult widely on draft proposals before they are made operational. Such a proposal would work; it would be just; it could be brought into operation swiftly—next year, not next century. It would properly protect the public.

It is significant that it is exactly this latter proposal which the Secretary of State for Scotland—I am not surprised that he has fled—is advancing in his White Paper for Scotland, in place of the proposals for automatic minimum sentences for repeat burglars and drug dealers.

It is the first duty of any Government to ensure that their citizens can leave their lives in freedom, free from fear and insecurity. In that first duty this Government have failed.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: No, I am coming to the end of my speech.

Britain today is a society disrupted and disfigured by crime and disorder, led by a Government who, on their own admission, have reduced the criminal justice system to a farce and a mockery. Under this Government, there is more crime, and more criminals are getting away with it. The British public need a criminal justice system that works, acting to prevent crime and its causes, dealing effectively with juvenile offenders, getting tough on criminal and anti-social neighbours, ensuring the proper protection of the public, giving effective backing to the police and real dignity to victims, and dealing effectively with persistent criminals.

Those are the answers to the epidemic of crime and disorder over which the Government have presided. The Secretary of State and his friends have had 17 years to get it right. They have failed. They have lost the trust of the British people. Where the Tories have failed in that first duty of Government, Labour will succeed.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I remind hon. Members that the 10-minute rule is now in operation.

5.9 pm

Sir Peter Lloyd (Fareham): The Labour party's amendment is one of brazen vacuity. The words appear in the second half of the amendment—they are well-known words and they trip familiarly off the tongue. They would make the kind of slogan for which advertising men receive prizes from other advertising men at seaside resorts every so often. However, the words remain devoid of any real meaning—even though the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has ostensibly addressed himself to them for the past 35 minutes. They may not have a clear meaning, but they have a clear purpose: to ingratiate the Labour party with readers of the Daily Mail and The Guardian at one and the same time—the Labour party hopes that the readers of each paper will notice only the half meant for them.

"tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime"

The Government have gone the other way. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has the admirable virtues of clarity and courage but—as he just said; it is no secret—he has, alas, upset the judiciary to the extent that one noble Lord remarked that relations between judges and the Executive were now at their lowest ebb since James I.

The way that people on both sides of the argument have reacted to the other side of the argument has allowed the impression to get about that the row is little more than a top people's demarcation dispute. It is far more important than that. I believe that dissension between judges and the Home Secretary damages both sides, and the respect in which the criminal justice system is held. It should have been avoided. The critics of the White Paper's sentencing proposals—I leave out the rest of the White Paper—have a powerful case. I agree with a number of the points that were made by the hon. Member for Blackburn.

I shall deal first with honesty in sentencing. There is a real problem for the public when they hear that a criminal who has been sentenced to three years is released after serving only 18 months. The judge and the professionals know that three years means 18 months in prison, plus any added days for misbehaviour, and 18 months at risk in the community—time that he will serve in prison if he commits another offence before the three years expires, in addition to the sentence for the new offence. The solution to this is simple—it does not need legislation. The judge should spell out in full what he and everyone else in the criminal justice world knows he is doing when he sentences, so that everyone else can know too.

By a strange irony, the change proposed by the Home Secretary will lead to different charges of sleight of hand. The Home Secretary wants the courts to take into account the change to serving full sentence so that there will be no general rise in the prison population. If the judges oblige, the prisoner who would have had three years will not serve three years as the public expects—he will still serve only 18 months, as the judge always knew he would. Moreover, because there will be less time after release when he will be at risk of serving the balance of the longer nominal sentence if he offends again, there will be less protection for the public.

Similarly, the loss of parole for more serious cases is not adequately replaced by earned remission. Earned remission has the merit of encouraging good co-operative behaviour in prison, which makes running a prison easier, but that is not quite the same thing as providing an incentive to prisoners to demonstrate that they will not be a danger again on their release and to make realistic preparations for that release. If the sentences remain the same, as the Home Secretary wishes, and parole disappears, the public will again be less well protected.

Secondly, where minimum sentences are concerned, I fear that the White Paper proposals are too sweeping. They will certainly lead to injustice. There are plenty of third-time burglars who should do more than three years and there are plenty of drug traffickers for whom seven years is too short—but there will be quite a few cases where such sentences will be visibly unjust and counter-productive.

For example, young drug addicts who sell small quantities of drugs to other addicts will get the same sentence as professional drug pushers. They will not come under the disclaimer in the White Paper because they have to be genuinely "exceptional" cases. They will not be genuinely "exceptional", and they will not be "unforeseeable". The same applies to opportunistic inadequates stealing from the homes of other people getting similar sentences as career housebreakers, as the Home Secretary just called them.

That will occur if the judiciary does not lengthen all sentences to maintain differentials. Perhaps, when my right hon. Friend the Minister of State winds up the debate, he will tell us about the Government's expectations in this regard. I fear that those minimum sentences will not do very much for deterrence, but that they will succeed in driving up the prison population.

[Sir Peter Lloyd]

Gaols will be filled with too many young drug addicts who ought not to be there and with the inadequate and immature for whom prison does not do much good, and does much harm if the education, training and diversionary programmes are not there. With a rising prison population and a reducing budget, such programmes will not be readily available. Perhaps the Minister will also refer to that in his winding-up speech.

Surely the right way to deal with sentences that are too short is to extend the prosecution's powers to appeal against them. The judiciary can do quite a lot more to achieve consistency, to demonstrate appropriate severity when needed and, most particularly, to explain to the public the principles on which it works in what is a complex and demanding task.

Thirdly, I am in complete sympathy with what the Home Secretary is seeking to do with mandatory life sentences for serious violent and sexual crimes. It cannot be right to release a violent offender back into the community when he is highly likely to attack again. In one sense, I would prefer to go further than the Home Secretary and find a means of detaining a violent first-time offender after the expiry of his determinate sentence if he shows signs of repeating it.

However, I do not feel that a mandatory life sentence is the right approach. It should be the unique and special penalty for the most serious of all crimes: murder. It is not right or wise to dilute it with a range of other very nasty but lesser crimes. The White Paper says that the judge will be responsible for the tariff and will presumably set one similar to, or perhaps below, the sentence that he would have given anyway. The public would quickly see that such a life sentence means even less than usual—so much for honesty in sentencing.

I would much prefer to see a new indeterminate sentence for violent or sex crimes that do not justify life but where the judge believes that there is a serious risk of violent reoffending. Previous violent offences would provide the strongest presumption for that. In the past, the judiciary may have underestimated public concern about violent reoffending. I hope that it will carefully consider the new sentencing powers that it needs to deal with violent reoffending more effectively.

Indeed, I hope that, in the next few months, while legislation is being prepared, there will be some serious rethinking all round—not least in the Home Office. If that happens, the White Paper will have had a positive effect on the safety of the public, and that, both the Home Secretary and the shadow spokesman have said, should be the overriding concern of penal policy.

5.18 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The Secretary of State for the Home Department has embarked on a futile task. He has lost all credibility on law and order—no one believes a word. The whole criminal system is collapsing. Hon. Members do not need to take my word for it—they need only visit a housing estate anywhere in the United Kingdom, talk to the people and listen to their expressions of anger. The people on the front line know precisely what is going on.

The whole legal system—legal aid, the arrangements for criminal investigations and the Crown Prosecution Service—is in deep trouble. Our constituency case loads reflect the reality. A case in my constituency encapsulates the problems with the system. It reveals inadequacies in both police investigations and CPS prosecution decisions and it has implications for sentencing. I shall draw it to the attention of the House today.

The case concerns a woman, Elaine Steele, who lives in my constituency. She was charged with murder—the charge was subsequently amended to manslaughter—over the death of her 23-month-old baby. She was accused of shaking the child violently and causing her death. On the basis of a highly questionable police investigation and a number of medical reports, the CPS decided to prosecute. The case collapsed within hours of arriving in court.

Many medical reports were produced in the Elaine Steele case, all of which I have read. On the basis of those reports, it is hard to see how anyone in his right mind would wish to prosecute Elaine Steele. One professional involved described her as "very competent" at feeding her child, who had been born prematurely, and another said that she was "brilliant" with her child. A third professional said that she "provided for her daughter and endeavoured to give her daughter the more intensive care and attention that a premature baby would require. Mrs Steele appears to have coped with the various difficulties of being a single mother."

Many statements supported her and her ability to look after her child.

The House must ask how such a woman ended up in the criminal system on a manslaughter charge. Why was the state prepared to use precious resources pursuing an innocent woman through the courts? The answer is that all reasonable lines of inquiry were never pursued. In October 1992, after she and her boyfriend had been interviewed about the circumstances surrounding the death of her child, Elaine Steele was not told that the police were treating her as the prime suspect. During two hours of questioning, she was not afforded the protection offered by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. She was later charged with murder.

Following her remand on bail, information began to surface about the activities of her boy friend. He was interviewed subsequently by the police, and soon afterwards the charge against Elaine Steele was reduced to manslaughter. Repeated questions have been asked about what occurred during the interview with her former boyfriend and during the wider investigation. Cases such as this undermine the credibility of the entire legal system.

The police officers concerned are well respected. Nevertheless, they have been the subject of serious allegations as to the procedures that they adopted. There are allegations that an attempt was made to cover up a lack of police professionalism. It has been alleged that the police sought to change their evidence and that they failed to pursue all reasonable lines of inquiry.

Thankfully, a diligent Workington solicitor was not satisfied with the police investigation. He rejected the "shaking" theory as an explanation of the child's death. He sought the advice of pathologists throughout the country and, in the end, he was able to challenge the established medical interpretation of events. A professional who dealt with the case stated:

"I do not think that anyone with a modicum of knowledge would ever believe that the Prosecution were not acting deliberately in a manner which was not investigative, which did not seek justice, which did not seek the truth, and merely sought a conviction. The Prosecution even applied to amend the Indictment at the beginning of the case in a forlorn attempt to enhance their opportunities for convictions. The case fell at the first hurdle, (on the evidence of her boyfriend) . . . and by 1.30 in the afternoon she was acquitted."

The problem is that a poorly conducted investigation combined with an irresponsible decision to prosecute has had unfortunate repercussions for Elaine Steele. An able young reporter on the local evening newspaper submitted an accurate report of the prosecution's opening case. However, the case collapsed after the paper's lunchtime deadline. Sadly, the damage caused by that report of the prosecution's case affects Elaine Steele to this day.

The local evening newspaper—which is an excellent publication—is deeply concerned about what happened. It reported the collapse of the case and the subsequent clearing of the mother on the following day. The tragedy is that, when Elaine has been out in Workington, she has been verbally abused. That is deeply distressing both for her and for her hard-working and respectable family, who have also been ostracised by the community.

I asked another lawyer, who was unconnected with the case, to review the papers. I shall quote—with the names removed—what he said about the investigation. He stated:

"There are a number of aspects of the case which cause me concern. The Police sought to entrap a distraught mother by avoiding the requirements of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. The Police subsequently tried to brush that particular episode under the carpet by blaming a typist"—

Mr. Sweeney: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance as to whether the hon. Gentleman's speech bears any relation to the matter that we are supposed to be discussing—sentencing.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) will explain how his speech relates to the debate, which is fairly broad.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I know that the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) has not been in the House for very long, but I remind him that this is the highest court in the land. Debates such as this provide the opportunity to raise issues in Parliament. I hope that I have not lost time through that intervention.

"The Police subsequently tried to brush that particular episode under the carpet by blaming a typist for making a typing error and supplying two further statements of the two Detective Constables involved. The Police agreed to that typist being interviewed, on behalf of Elaine's solicitor, although a Detective Chief Inspector sat through the interview. It was he however who refused a further interview with the typist when it became apparent that she had more to say.

It is against all normal custom in criminal investigations for an officer who is involved in the case to be present at such an interview let alone make the decision that there should not be a further interview."

Many strong words have been uttered during this affair, but one must read the evidence—particularly the statements—to realise why people have such strong opinions about the case. The truth is that Mrs. Elaine Steele had nothing at all to do with the death of her child: she is totally innocent. The court found her innocent and her friends know that she is innocent. The person who should have been interviewed in depth about what happened was never properly interviewed. Elaine Steele is the victim of a failing system.

I feel very strongly that an injustice has been done. Elaine Steele may not have been sentenced by the court, but she has certainly been sentenced by some in the community. It was not sufficient to find her innocent in a court of law. She is the victim of a poorly conducted police investigation and of a stupid decision to prosecute by the Crown Prosecution Service. As a result, and due to some difficult publicity, she feels rejected in her own community.

I ask the people of Workington—particularly those who live in the local community—to look into their hearts and to realise that the injustice must end. I ask them to support Elaine Steele with warmth and with friendship. It cannot be right for an innocent person to be regarded as guilty and to be victimised after all that she has suffered.

Mr. Peter Butler (Milton Keynes, North–East): There is some agreement on both sides of the House that there are flaws in the Criminal Justice Act 1991. I, together with many of my colleagues, came to the House determined to reverse those injustices. Apart from the unjust and unworkable unit fines system, which quickly brought the criminal justice system into disrepute, the Act contained two other major flaws. The first was the argument in section 1 that people could be sentenced for up to two offences and no more, no matter how many they had committed; and the second was the requirement that previous convictions and failure to respond to previous sentences must be ignored, so that every offender was treated as a first-time offender for sentencing purposes. Both provisions were palpably absurd.

Although the present Parliament has repealed those sections properly and promptly, it sometimes seems as though too many sentencers wish to apply the principles that were embodied in the Act. How else can one explain the statistic that, in the Crown court in 1993-94, those convicted on a first offence of burglary of a dwelling received an average sentence of 16 months' imprisonment, while those who were convicted of their seventh or subsequent offence of burglary of a dwelling received only three months more on average?

Some 28 per cent. of those convicted in a Crown court of a seventh or subsequent burglary of a dwelling received a sentence which did not involve imprisonment. For magistrates courts, the figure was 61 per cent. So someone being tried in a magistrates court for a seventh, 10th or 30th burglary of a dwelling house was 60 per cent. likely not to go to prison and nearly 30 per cent. likely not to go to prison if tried in a Crown court. That is absurd, set against the background of a maximum sentence of 14 years for that offence.

The criminal justice system is there not to serve the voluntary offender but to protect the involuntary victim. I share the objective of the sections of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 that I mentioned, to the extent that the intention of those sections was to reduce the prison population, but I want to reduce the prison population by having fewer people commit crimes, not by leaving in the community those individuals who want to rob, burgle, attack, steal from and terrorise that community.

I shall give one example of the effect of prior legislation. A constituent suffered an unprovoked attack by a man armed with a knife. The attacker was sent to prison. In the interim period before he was convicted, he had played every trick in the book—many hon. Members are well aware of them—to delay the day of reckoning and to serve his time on remand. The result was that, on the first weekend after his conviction and sentence, my constituent saw her attacker walking up the street in which she lived. She fled inside, locked the door and rang the police to say that he had escaped. It turned out that he had not escaped but was on weekend leave. That is what I mean by terror, and my constituent felt terror in that instance.

One of the excellent proposals tucked away inside the document that we should be debating this afternoon is a change that means that the judge will have to specify the date on which a sentence starts to run and may disregard for that purpose the time spent on remand that is due to the defendant's manipulation of the system. That reform is long overdue and welcome. It will help to reduce the terror that those people can bring to law-abiding members of the community.

We must try to avoid the trap of mentioning, for example,

"a second serious violent or sexual offence"

or

"a third or subsequent burglary of a dwelling"

only to forget about such offences thereafter and discuss only policy and criminological theories. We must remember that that is the standard structure of a speech in mitigation, the objective of which is to minimise awareness of the offence, let alone its effect on the victim. It does not bode well for us if we fall into that trap. We owe a duty to our constituents to protect them, and our starting point must be to remember the effect on them of such serious crimes. Our duty is prevent them from becoming victims, not to accept that they might become victims and then to deal with offenders.

The public believe, rightly, that more could be done to prevent crime and that what has been done has not prevented dangerous criminals from being released back on to the streets, even in circumstances in which criminologists, probation officers and prison officers are convinced that those criminals will offend again; they will seek new victims whose lives could and should have been spared such tragic interference.

I agree with the Home Secretary and the White Paper that automatic early release enrages victims. The current system does not provide any method to ensure that criminals known still to be a threat can be detained. I therefore welcome the proposal that earned remission, and earned remission only, can reduce the sentence. Good behaviour will no longer be assumed but will have to be demonstrated.

Conservative Members want to reduce the number of offenders and that view must be shared by all right hon. and hon. Members. That will mean fewer people to punish, but the measure of success is not the number of criminals: it is reductions in the number of victims. That is usually translated to mean a reduction in the number of offences, but that is the only point on which a criminal justice system can claim success or be accused of failure. To reduce the number of victims, it is necessary to deter offenders from choosing to offend. That is to state the obvious, but the obvious is always worth stating in the House, as elsewhere.

I am pleased to see that prevention of crime and effective policing are the largest sections in the document. In some ways, even in most ways perhaps, they are the most important sections. Let us be clear that the main purpose of sentencing is the prevention of further crime. The person most likely to offend is the one who has demonstrated his willingness so to do in the past. He must be persuaded to make a different choice in future, but—this is one of the premises of the proposals—if he will not allow himself to be so persuaded, society is justified in securing its safety by removing his liberty and his opportunity to offend again.

Too often, sentences do not seem to serve the public adequately. It is the public whom sentences should serve, not the criminal justice system or those employed by it. In my judgment, mandatory minimum sentences have been proven to work, and I pray in aid the mandatory minimum disqualification period in offences of driving under the influence of excess alcohol. That has been an effective deterrent to the dangerous practice of driving after drinking too much, although it is, of course, subject to an exceptional circumstances exemption. The fact remains that people do not drink and drive, because they know that, if caught, they will lose their driving licence. The change from the possible loss of one's licence to a mandatory loss by law was marked by a significant reduction in such offences, which has continued. Therefore, the mandatory minimum sentence is not just theory; it has been proven to work in practice.

Opponents claim that the proposals constitute an attempt by the executive to usurp the power of the judiciary, to take power away from judges and to give it to politicians. That is at best a false, simplistic argument and it is also wrong. To expose that, I shall make two brief points. First, we should ask from where the judges' power comes. Apart from some vestigial common law powers, their power comes from the people by way of Acts passed in the House. They have no other powers. Why would it be interference to prescribe a minimum sentence when it is not interference to prescribe a maximum sentence? I would be happier to hear judges complain about being restricted by a 14-year maximum sentence for repeat burglars who enter people's houses than to hear them complain about a proposed three-year minimum sentence. If it is interference to propose a minimum, it must also logically be interference to propose a maximum.

Secondly, let us follow the judges' argument to its logical conclusion. If it would be wrong to fetter a judge's discretion through mandatory minimum sentences, the same argument must apply to anything that fetters that discretion. That is the path that leads to the sentences for all offences being described as "such sentence as the judge considers appropriate in all the circumstances of the case", or words to that effect. That is the inevitable conclusion of that approach. I do not think that that is a reasonable proposition and we should not be persuaded to accept the first step towards it.

I do not accept the argument, which is always brought out of retirement and dusted down on such occasions, that the issue is not the sentence but the probability of arrest and conviction. That is sophistry. A 100 per cent. certainty of being fined 1p would deter nobody, nor would a 1 per cent. chance of imprisonment for life deter many. There must be a balance and, arguably, the lower the likelihood of conviction, the harsher the prospective sentence needs to be to deter. We are beginning to see a rise in the likelihood of conviction and we must couple that with proper minimum sentences.

The Government's proposals are a means to ensure that the most dangerous criminals are not let back out on to the streets and that criminal behaviour is deterred through balanced, well-defined punishments that carry great certainty. That will further restore the confidence of a public fed up with crime and the morale of police officers tired of often working in vain.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

5.37 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The speech by the right hon. Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd) should be required reading in the Home Office. It was an excellent critique of the Government's proposals. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman's experience in the Home Office and what he has said today will be considered fully by the Government before they introduce any legislative proposals.

The White Paper "On the Record", published this afternoon, deals with access to criminal records. Broadly speaking, I and my party would support proposals that would ensure that employers and voluntary agencies, in appropriate circumstances, can have access to criminal records if they are relevant to the employment in question. However, in appendix B of the White Paper there is a new piece of theory which rings alarm bells and, I suspect, will be the subject of much criticism. It would reduce acquittals to the status of unproved convictions and would enable information to be given to employers, even about an acquittal, on the basis of the opinion of police officers.

I say to the Minister, partly on the basis of my 26 years of experience at the Bar, that police officers' opinions are often extremely reliable, but they are sometimes extremely unreliable. It would be an outrage to introduce a power to disclose an acquittal as information relevant to someone's employment unless a counter-balance were introduced to enable the subject to challenge the disclosure of that information. Without that counter-balance, we would be proceeding down a slippery slope where rumour came to have the force of law. That would not be acceptable.

I make two preliminary points on the main substance of the debate, one as a question and the other as a statistic. First, the question: how do the Home Secretary and the Minister of State account for the fact that, in 1991, contrary to the advice of the judges, they supported proposals that were designed to secure that fewer and fewer people went to prison, when today they support proposals that are designed to secure that more and more people go to prison? The House is entitled to logical explanation, if one be available, which I doubt, of that change of mind.

As an adjunct to my question, I ask the Minister to tell the House honestly and for the first time that the Government are now asking judges to pass shorter sentences. Is that not right? If there is not to be a significant increase in the prison population, as I think the right hon. Member for Fareham was implying, it is inevitable that judges will have to pass shorter sentences. If they do, by doing the will of the Government they will be passing shorter sentences for burglary, robbery and offences of actual bodily harm.

Mr. Butler: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Carlile: It is a short debate and I shall not give way. There is not much time.

Is it not a fact that the Government intend judges to pass shorter sentences? Is that the way in which they intend to send out the message that they will deal with crime?

The fact to which I wish to draw to the attention of Ministers—it is intended to deal with the canard that the Government can claim credit for the reduction in reported crime—is that most crime is committed by young men aged between 13 and 25. That is statistically proven. In the past 20 years, there has been a 13.6 per cent. reduction in the proportion of young men under 25 in the population. It would therefore be expected in the ordinary way that there would be a reduction in reported crime for that very reason alone. Let us lay the ghost of any credit that the Government can claim for a reduction in reported crime. The answer lies in a demographic fact.

Following my intervention, the Home Secretary offered to write to me on the reduction in reported crime. I look forward to receiving his letter. I shall be interested to examine the Home Office research that he claims to form the basis of what he is saying. I do not believe that such research exists. Having mentioned Home Office research, I express my sympathy for the high-quality research department within the Home Office. It used to be used as the locus classicus for legislative change in criminal justice. It is now the last place the Home Secretary looks for changes in criminal justice policy, despite the fact that the department continues to produce research of the highest quality.

The Home Secretary claims that prison works. It works as a cupboard in which we put people for a period so that they cannot commit crime. For the most part that is true, and self-evidently so. But surely prison really works only if, as a result of imprisonment, those who have been incarcerated do not repeat crime after release.

Young men commit small burglaries to buy drugs. Perhaps they buy drugs for less than £100. They share them out among their friends, and thus they are suppliers. They then commit another small burglary to obtain drugs. Again, they share them out among their friends. Next time, it is then three and out. As the right hon. Member for Fareham said, that will cause manifest injustice. What on earth is the interest—[Interruption.] I wish that the parliamentary private secretary, or whatever the hon. Gentleman is, would stop grunting behind the Minister of State.

If there is to be manifest injustice, what on earth is the Government's interest in introducing minimum sentences? Judges can, and do, pass severe sentences for serious crime. If the Government think that judges are not passing sufficiently severe sentences for serious crimes, it is open to the Attorney-General to appeal to the Court of Appeal against those sentences. I would be the first to concede that, because the prosecution's right of appeal has been exercised carefully and responsibly, it has worked reasonably well since its introduction.

[Mr. Carlile]

It is proposed that there should be mandatory life sentences for offences other than homicide. I face with terror, as do many others, including Lord Taylor of Gosforth, the former Lord Chief Justice, the consequences of mandatory life sentences for rape. What will happen? I ask Ministers to listen, which they failed to do in 1991. Their failure to listen caused them to have to unwrap the 1991 legislation and change it.

I beg Ministers to listen for once to people who hear evidence in the criminal courts and who sentence people—in other words, the judges. Ministers should listen for once to those of us who in practice have to deal with cases in the criminal courts, whether as prosecutors, defenders or police officers. Many police officers who carry out the real inquiries do not support the Government. The same can be said of probation officers and, especially, the families of victims of crime.

I shall tell the Minister of State what will happen if mandatory life sentences are introduced for rape. People will be murdered because offenders will know that, if they are caught, they will be sentenced to life imprisonment for rape in any event. The Minister of State shakes his head. He does so against a weight of authority, which includes the former Lord Chief Justice, Lord Donaldson, and Lord Justice Rose, whose practice was not in esoteric areas of the law. Lord Justice Rose, as he now is, came from Manchester to the High Court and the Court of Appeal. He has applied a wealth of practical experience. The Minister shakes his head against almost every criminologist in the country and, I believe, against the views of the researchers within his Department.

Mr. Maclean rose—

Mr. Carlile: I shall give way briefly.

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I merely wish to say that I have the weight of evidence from the Home Office research department on my side when I shake my head in response to the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument.

Mr. Carlile: The right hon. Gentleman may claim that there is some evidence on his side. I should like to see it. I do not understand how the right hon. Gentleman can claim to have evidence on his side that overwhelms Lord Taylor, Lord Justice Rose, David Faulkner and all the other authoritative figures who have ranged themselves against the Government's proposals. If the right hon. Gentleman goes to Oxford university, which the Government hold so dear, and listens to the criminologists there, including David Faulkner, Sir Stephen Tumim and Roger Hood—there is a bevy of them—they will tell him that what the Government are saying about minimum sentences, and especially mandatory life sentences, is utter and absolute nonsense.

Prison works? It works as a way of paying builders for building prisons. That is the only way in which it works. Are the Government, who reduced the prison budget by 13 per cent., making prison work? They removed every probation officer from our prisons. Is that making prison work? They are cutting prison education, which enables young men and women who are illiterate when they enter prison to leave literate and able to obtain jobs. Is that the Government making prison work?

In taking the actions to which I have referred, the Government, at the same time, are proposing to spend between £600 million and £1 billion on creating new lock-ups so that we can have a far larger prison population than ever before. The Minister should take account of the experience of the United States, where they imprison far more people than we do. He will find that prison does not work there. The prison population of the United States, which, proportionally, is far in excess of ours, has not decreased. Violent crime in the United States has continued to increase. The Government seem to rely on an American experience that is a failure.

I shall say a few words about boot camps. The Minister cites evidence from the Home Office, but I suggest that he look at the Home Office research on what happened during the unhappy period of the short sharp shock. Two things happened: one group of prisoners were bullied; the other group took it like the easy medicine it was for fit young men, who came out more fit to commit more crime of the sort that they had committed before they went in.

The truth is that the Government have not begun to tackle the reasons why young people commit crime. I saw a sentence in a Home Office press release about the possible introduction of drug courts. That is the sort of idea that the Government should consider seriously and to which they should devote their attention—breaking the spiral of drug misuse that turns young people in this country to crime.

The Government should pay more attention to the prevention of crime by ensuring that hard messages are delivered to schools and colleges by police officers and others who understand and can explain the consequences of offending, but we see little about that. It is time the Government concentrated on the reasons why people commit crime, and did not simply devote themselves to the rhetoric of retribution. I fear that the Government are doing a grave disservice to this country by misrepresenting the criminal justice issues in the rhetoric of retribution.

A democratic representative in the United States, Mr. Bobby Scott, was quoted in The Economist last week as saying:

"When you call for more incarceration, you do not have to explain yourself; when you argue for effective alternatives, you do."

The Government have simply decided that they can profit electorally from that simple message. The Government cannot explain themselves; but those of us who believe in sensible, constructive sentencing that will reduce the incidence of criminal behaviour believe that we can—and we shall not fear to criticise the Government's simplistic approach before the electorate at the appropriate time.

5.51 pm

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): I welcome the Government's proposal to abolish automatic early release from prison. Hon. Members who have experience of representing defendants in criminal proceedings will be aware that everyone involved in the court system—particularly old lags who have done time before—make an immediate mental calculation when the sentence is handed down of what it really means after allowing for the appropriate discount. Some people would argue that we already have realism in sentencing, because even the general public know enough about the law to know that an automatic discount applies.

I believe that the present system brings the law into disrepute. The public are entitled to know that the sentence when passed is the sentence that will be served, subject to a small discount that will have to be earned through good behaviour. It is in the interests of the smooth running of prisons and of rehabilitation that inmates should have an incentive to maintain good behaviour throughout their sentence to maximise the discount earned.

There has been speculation about whether honesty in sentencing would lead to a big increase in the prison population. Judges will, of course, be able to reduce the sentence to achieve the intended net objective. If judges choose not to reduce the nominal sentence passed, on the face of it the prison population will increase, but there would be an increased deterrent effect if effective sentences were seen to be longer. That would, I hope, reduce the number of defendants coming before the courts.

I warmly welcome the proposal to introduce automatic life sentences for people over 18 convicted for a second time of a serious sexual or violent offence. Such a measure would ensure that it is possible to prevent such offenders, who remain a danger to the public, from being released. The need for such a measure is demonstrated by statistics that show that 10 per cent. of offenders released after serving a sentence for serious sexual or violent offences go on to commit similar terrible offences again.

I also welcome the proposal that persistent dealers in hard drugs should receive an automatic minimum prison sentence of seven years. My right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd) was worried that this might involve people who were not serious offenders receiving a mandatory seven-year sentence. My answer to that is that they should think of that before they commit the offence. The imposition of such a significant minimum sentence would ensure that offenders received their just desserts, particularly the most serious offenders, who, morally, should receive the death penalty or, failing that, a life sentence for the terrible despair, pain and loss of life that they produce in exchange for personal gain.

The proposed automatic minimum prison sentences for persistent domestic burglars are also welcome. It is outrageous that a professional burglar convicted of seven or more burglaries spends little more time inside than they would for a first conviction. Any professional criminal weighs up two things in deciding whether to commit a particular offence: first, the risk of getting caught; secondly, the severity, or otherwise, of the likely sentence.

So far as certainty of detection is concerned, the Government have rightly increased resources for the police. In my constituency, some two dozen extra police officers have been appointed in the past few months—and very necessary they are, too. The police are targeting known and persistent burglars and are increasing detection rates. The success of Operation Bumblebee, launched by the Metropolitan police in 1991, has been emulated by other forces. As every person with any common sense knows, it is no good catching criminals unless they are convicted and given an appropriately severe sentence. A minimum sentence of three years for persistent burglars will help to persuade them that crime does not pay and that they would be better off earning an honest living.

There are, of course, do-gooders on the Opposition Benches who question the value of prison sentences. In the past three and a half years, the prison population has risen by 25 per cent. and crime has fallen by 8.5 per cent. In my opinion, that is no coincidence. In 1995, 468,000 fewer crimes were recorded in England and Wales than in 1994—the largest ever continuous fall in the number of annually recorded crimes. When criminals are behind bars, they cannot commit crimes against the general public. About two thirds of all crimes are committed by one fifth of offenders, so it is common sense that the number of crimes falls when persistent offenders are out of circulation. Home Office research suggests that between three and 13 offences could be prevented when each domestic burglar is imprisoned for a year rather than given a community sentence.

Mandatory sentences are nothing new. They already exist, as my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Mr. Butler) pointed out, for drink-driving. Who can doubt that it is the certainty of losing their licence if caught and convicted that has deterred many people from drinking and driving?

Prison sentences do not only prevent offences; they deter offenders. The police and the public clearly believe that. As the president of the Association of Chief Police Officers, Mr. Jim Sharples, said on BBC Radio 4's "Today" programme on 14 October 1995:

"people who commit serious offences should expect long custodial sentences. Minimum sentences do have a role in our view in playing a part in deterrence".

Recent research has also shown that prison has a deterrent effect. For example, Burnett's 1992 study, which was based on interviews with prisoners, found that, for the whole sample, avoidance of imprisonment was the most frequently mentioned reason for not wanting to reoffend.

Those who argue against prison sentences say that they make bad people worse. The facts do not bear that out. The latest reconviction rates, published in February 1996, show that 51 per cent. of prisoners reoffended within two years of release, compared with 55 per cent. of those who were given community service orders. Given that offenders sent to prison are higher up the tariff than offenders given community service, prison is even more successful than those bald figures suggest.

It has been suggested in some quarters that it is somehow wrong to risk upsetting judges by creating minimum sentences. There is nothing wrong with Parliament legislating to impose maximum, minimum or mandatory sentences. Indeed, Parliament would be failing in its duty if it did not continue to address the issue of excessively lenient sentences.

5.59 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Ministers should find it enlightening and humbling to read the record of a debate that took place in the other place on 23 May. Indeed, that debate is important to all of us, including the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney). In that unprecedented debate, the Lord Chief Justice issued a comprehensive critique of the Government's proposal. What was unprecedented was the fact that a direct criticism of the Home Secretary was made by the most senior lawyers in the country and by former Home Office Ministers. Indeed, a former Home Office Minister, the right hon. Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd), spoke today. That should give the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan and others at least cause for reflection and consideration. They should take account of the words of those who have had to make decisions about individuals and policy in connection with a very complex issue.

In the other place, there was also a comprehensive mauling of the way in which the Home Secretary had used statistics in the White Paper, making them less and less credible. Phrases such as "flimsy and dubious evidence", "partial and tainted", "shallow and untested" and "highly misleading" were used by figures such as Lord Donaldson and the Lord Chief Justice. That should give the Home Secretary and other Home Office Ministers cause to reflect.

Rather in the style of Mark Antony, those who spoke in that debate said that they were not aiming directly at the Home Secretary's bona fides, because the Home Secretary was an honourable man. The message was clear, however: everyone considered the White Paper on sentencing to be a highly partisan exercise, unrelated to the needs of criminal justice. The Home Secretary has, uniquely, managed to array against him and his policies the senior judges in the country and the great majority of practitioners.

The Home Secretary may say that that does not matter: that the editorial writers of the tabloids are on his side, and that he is confident that public opinion—or, perhaps, the electorate—is also on his side. It is true that the public are anxious about the doubling of crime over the past few years and the decline in law and order, but it is wrong for politicians, particularly Home Secretaries, to pander to that opinion, pretending that they have the answers and implying that judges cannot be trusted to impose the appropriate sentences.

Although the immediate response of many individuals—the person in the street—is "Yes, sentences should be more severe," that was not reflected in the only major test involving people who had followed cases through and observed them at first hand. I refer to the research of Professor Zander, carried out for the Runciman commission. Of nearly 10,000 jurors—average citizens—only 15 per cent. thought that sentences in cases that they had heard should have been more severe and were surprised that they had not been.

Why is such a wide array of criminal justice practitioners so profoundly hostile to the Home Secretary, his proposals and his practice? Partly because they see the White Paper as just another partisan initiative from this most political of Home Secretaries. He is all too ready, for example, to rely on examples from the United States, as if that country were a paragon of success in criminal justice. We know that, per head of population, the United States imprisons far more people than any other developed country.

The practitioners see the proposals as part of an election manifesto, or as a man trap for the Opposition, rather than a serious attempt to deal with real problems. They know that—as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) pointed out—the proposals cannot come into effect until the year 2000, although the Home Secretary could deal with the problem immediately if he wanted to, either by revamping the means of referral to the Court of Appeal's criminal division or by way of a sentencing council. They cannot see how the prison population will not escalate—and explode—as a result of the Home Secretary's proposals, unless judges are in effect told to pronounce shorter sentences, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said in his excellent speech.

The practitioners consider the proposals unnecessary, because judges now have the power—in rape cases, for example—to impose life sentences. Moreover, there can be a referral by the Attorney-General in respect of lenient sentences. Above all, those with experience of the criminal justice system see the proposals as unjust, as an affront to basic constitutional principles and as removing judges' discretion to do justice in individual cases.

The right hon. Member for Fareham gave a good example in respect of young people in drug cases. Burglaries are another instance. A young man may go into the private area of a public house and take an ashtray as a first offence; he may put his arm through a window—which is technically a burglary—as a second offence; and he may do something relatively minor as a third offence. In effect, the judge has no discretion in cases of that kind.

We need consistency and openness in sentencing. I would agree with the introduction of sentencing bands, so that a judge could make it clear what a sentence meant in practice—although, as has been pointed out, most criminals can estimate what a sentence will mean in their case. However, we should pay attention to the anxieties expressed by the public. The key role of the criminal justice system is to protect the public—that should always be the starting point—but the policy makers should then act, not in a partisan spirit, and not as if they were delivering yet another speech to their party conference, but after cool appraisal and on the basis of respectable research that is accepted in the profession as a whole.

Senior judges, including the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Donaldson, cast clear aspersions on the validity of the research on which the White Paper was founded. Policy makers should also listen carefully, and with respect, to practitioners who know the problem of applying complex considerations to the infinite variety of individual cases.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): The voice of what might be described as the producer lobby in the criminal justice system has been well aired this evening, not only by the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) but by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I believe that we have allowed policy to be influenced excessively by that producer lobby, in the sphere of criminal justice as in so many others. It is the belief that the views of judges, lawyers and others who derive their living from administering or working in the criminal justice system should always hold sway over the general public's views that put the country in the terrible state that it was in in 1979.

This is the first occasion on which I have spoken in a criminal justice debate. I do so because it is impossible to ignore the profound concern in my constituency about the level of crime—a concern that exists despite the welcome fall that has taken place over the past couple of years. As we know, it is not just the level of crime but the fear of crime that blights the quality of life, and many more years of falling crime rates will be needed before that fear is removed.

Having represented a largely rural seat for 13 years, I am conscious that the fear of crime has increased substantially in the countryside. There is a strong and widely held perception that police resources, especially manpower, are targeted on towns, and that crime prevention measures such as closed-circuit television are most effective in urban areas. The facts may tell a slightly different story, but perceptions are important, and they take a long time to change.

On behalf of all my constituents I give the warmest possible welcome to the proposals—especially the sentencing proposals—in the White Paper, "Protecting the Public". In particular, my constituent, Martin Crawshay, and his colleagues on South Suffolk law and order committee, with whom I have worked closely for several years, are glad that some of the concerns that were voiced at our meeting last year with my right hon. Friend the Minister of State have been listened to.

Let me express my appreciation of the much-improved Home Office funding of Suffolk police for 1996-97. I observed their excellent and effective work at first hand on night patrol a few weeks ago with officers from Sudbury, under the command of Inspector Mark Cordell.

Well-resourced police, backed up by co-operative and law-abiding members of the public, are only part of a successful strategy to combat crime. We also needs courts whose powers and procedures facilitate rather than impede justice. Once convictions have been obtained, we need sentences that deter criminals and protect the public.

It is his approach to sentencing policy for which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary deserves particular congratulation. Almost single-handedly, he has reversed the drift of post-war penal policy. For far too long, sentencing policy has appeared to be driven by the interests of criminals, by the capacity of the prison system or by cherished experiments of prison and penal reformers—by anything except the interests of the law-abiding citizen.

The title of the White Paper—"Protecting the Public"—is a welcome departure from past thinking. It acknowledges that one of the most basic duties of the Government is the protection of their citizens. I should like to tell my right hon. and learned Friend that, since some of his proposals on sentencing have come under attack by senior judges and other representatives of the producer lobby, I have not met a constituent of any age, occupation or background who agrees with the judges' criticisms or disagrees with my right hon. and learned Friend's approach. For the first time for several generations, it appears that common sense rather than wishful and woolly idealism is to be the basis of our policy.

Rising crime figures—happily, at least partially reversed but still far too high—suggest that previous sentencing policy provided neither a deterrent to criminals nor protection for the public. It was, and is, high time for an alternative approach that may or may not be successful. I listened carefully to the reservations of my right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd). We do not know whether the new approach will succeed, but, my goodness, it is at least worth a try, given the proven and complete failure of the system in the last half century.

Where convictions of persistent or violent offenders are followed by longer sentences, at least the criminals cannot reoffend while they are in prison. A few more citizens may sleep a little more safely in their beds. Indeed, the only criticism that I have heard of the White Paper's proposals that has any resonance is that they were not introduced sooner. It is a matter of surprise and regret that it has taken 17 years of a Conservative Government to introduce this element of common sense into sentencing policy.

I have a few constituents, however, who, despite all their experience, are influenced by opinion polls, and for that reason they are interested in the Labour party's approach to the subject. They will have listened in vain today, as on many other occasions when the subject has been debated, for any expression of regret by the Labour party for its opposition in the House to all the measures taken over many years designed to help the police to track offenders and to maintain order. They will have listened in vain for any expression of regret from the Labour party for its opposition to measures that improved court procedures so that guilty people could be brought to book. They will have listened in vain for any expression of regret by the Labour party for its resistance to measures designed to introduce stiffer sentences.

Fortunately, there is still time for the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), to say, "We in the Labour party were wrong year after year to oppose all these measures. We now apologise to people whose homes have been burgled or who have suffered physical violence at the hands of criminals who might have been behind bars if our delaying tactics in the House had not prevented the swifter passage of Conservative legislation on to the statute book."

There is still time for the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth to say that the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), whose approach to sentencing when shadow Home Secretary was indistinguishable in every respect from old Labour, was as wrong on that issue as he was on privatisation, industrial relations reform, tax, public spending and the nuclear deterrent throughout his political career.

Now, at the eleventh hour, in a shameless and unprincipled opportunist attempt to win office, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield claims to believe the opposite of what he argued for over many years—the opposite of what most Labour Members and most members of the shadow Cabinet secretly, or not so secretly, argue for.

There is still time for the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth to tell my constituents—who will be very interested to hear him; if he remains silent, they will draw their own conclusion—that all the past policies of the Labour party were wholly wrong, and to apologise for them. If he fails to do so, the House will know that nothing has changed and that Labour party policy remains to shed crocodile tears over the plight of the victims of crime while resolutely refusing to support measures likely to make life tougher for the criminal.

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): I welcome the proposals of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and I know that many of my constituents and many people throughout our great county of Yorkshire will join me in that welcome.

[Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock]

We now have the toughest Home Secretary and Home Office Ministers that we have had for many years. That is widely welcomed, certainly outside the House, if not in the Chamber this evening. Many people in the United Kingdom want to see the White Paper's tougher measures put into operation as quickly as possible.

The Government have a duty to protect their citizens and to ensure that they can go about their normal lawful business and not be locked up in their homes when criminals are on the loose. Criminals should be locked up in prison, away from decent, law-abiding people.

We have heard much about young people on our streets—even young people under 10. What about parents? No one has mentioned the responsibility of parents to look after their young people, particularly those under 10, who should not be on the streets in the evening.

The punishment should always fit the crime, and persistent serious violent criminals should get stiff sentences. Early release should not be automatic; it should be earned, and I am pleased to see that that is now proposed. Prisons work—of course they work, because they keep people locked up, and when they are locked up, they are not committing more crime.

We have heard much about what Parliament and the Home Secretary should or should not do in making laws. Parliament makes laws, the judiciary implement them, and from time to time there will be discussion between the two. Offenders sentenced to under four years in prison are released once they have served half their sentence, and that cannot be right. Such early release enrages victims and their families, as many hon. Members will understand.

In 1994, 217 offenders were convicted of a second serious sexual or violent crime such as rape or attempted murder. All could have been given a life sentence, but only 10 were. Unless they get a life sentence, they must be released once they have served two thirds of their sentence, even if it is well known that they are still a danger to the public.

Under the Government's proposals, anyone aged 18 or over who is convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence for the second time will automatically get a life sentence. I have listened to what many of the professionals in the House have said about that, but I believe that it is right. Such second offenders would be released only when they no longer posed a danger to the public.

In such cases, the trial judge will determine the minimum sentence to be served by way of retribution and deterrence. The parole board can then decide whether it is safe to release the offender. Individuals who continue to pose a danger to the public would remain in prison—indefinitely, if necessary. All cases need careful assessment. Many criminals are released early, only to reoffend quickly.

The former Lord Chief Justice, Lord Taylor, said recently:

> "I believe public confidence in the system is ended when convicted criminals are seen to walk free from prison after serving rather less than half their sentences, however good their behaviour may have been in the interim."

He was right.

Many of my constituents will welcome the proposal that the average sentence for a third conviction of dealing in hard drugs such as heroin or Ecstasy should be more than four years. Many of us believe that even that punishment is not sufficiently severe, but we welcome tougher sentencing of individuals who not only take drugs but deal in them, and affect the lives of many young people. In the past 12 months, we have seen the deaths of several young people who would be alive today were it not for the availability of drugs on our streets.

The proposal for stiffer sentences for persistent burglars will also be welcomed. While a burglary may only take the form of an entry on a court list, that cannot reflect its effect on the victim—who may be an elderly person living alone.

In 1993-94, the average Crown court sentence passed on a first-time domestic burglar was 16.2 months, but for offenders with seven or more convictions, it was only 19.4 months—which is nonsense. Almost 30 per cent. of those offenders were not imprisoned, but returned to the community to continue their nefarious activities. I am pleased that it is proposed that any person aged 18 or over convicted of domestic burglary and with two or more previous convictions for similar offences will automatically receive a minimum three-year sentence.

Many professionals have said that the Home Secretary's proposals are unrealistic and will not work, but many people outside the House want tougher sentencing and longer terms of imprisonment, to prevent reoffending. The public welcome the decrease in crime, but they also want to go about their business and not have to lock themselves into their homes early in the evening because of the number of criminals who are released from prison to stalk our streets.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): I have a deep sense of anger and frustration at the problems experienced by many of my constituents every day of their lives. I will try to control myself and not use unparliamentary language—although I doubt that anything I might say could match the comments made to me every day of the week.

The Home Secretary did not address disorder—neighbour nuisance, harassment, abuse, anti-social behaviour in the street, vandalism and graffiti. I was looking forward to seeing whether "Protecting the Public" would address those problems. Paragraph 3.41 states:

> "It is vital that the law should be adequate to enable the police to maintain public order."

Excellent—but the paragraph goes on to cite

"travellers who invade rural communities" and

"illegal open air raves".

Neither applies to my urban constituency.

Paragraph 3.42 states:

> "The Government believes it is intolerable that trespassers should be allowed to ruin people's enjoyment of their own property or their legitimate business activity."

Although that is correct, do not the Government consider it intolerable that people should be allowed to ruin their neighbours' lives and to make life a misery for the public on the streets? If the Government think that, why are they not addressing those problems? At present, the only redress is an injunction in the civil courts, but the cost is a deterrent. It is time the Government gave those problems more serious attention than does the White Paper.

I was not surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) mentioned a 12 per cent. rise in public disorder complaints. I receive letters and telephone calls every week from constituents in various states of depression, anxiety and frustration.

The Home Office has commented that public disorder leads to high levels of avoidance behaviour. People are afraid to go out at night. Pensioners remain in their homes, terrified. Women will not contemplate going out at night because they fear that the streets are unsafe. The term "avoidance behaviour" is a pretty way of describing the absolute terror felt by the people who adopt it. Initiatives such as Homewatch and Streetwatch are attempting to address public disorder, but they will not be successful unless such disorder and its causes are properly addressed.

After a surgery, I often have to write to the chief superintendent about matters raised by my constituents. That correspondence has increased over the past year. The Stockport police have always been responsive and helpful within the limits of their resources and existing law.

I will cite a typical, not abnormal case that came to my attention last Saturday. One of my constituents suffers from angina, spondylitis and epilepsy—and his wife suffers from cirrhosis and is taking anti-depressants. The couple's 12-year-old daughter and 11-year-old son are terrified of going out on the streets. That family live on a council estate, but they have no chance of being transferred, because the level of harassment that they are suffering—windows being smashed and targeted burglaries—is normal for that estate. That couple would have to suffer more to be placed on the transfer list.

The council does its best. The only power at its disposal is eviction, but that relies on evidence. People are unwilling to give evidence, because they will end up suffering more harassment without protection. It is not enough for the council to rely on civil remedies. The law should make it easier for the police to intervene and control the environment.

In another part of my constituency, a public meeting was held after several months of anti-social behaviour by youths on the street. It was attended by 150 residents and police representatives. The residents vociferously expressed their problems. Such public meetings are held all year round. As soon as one public meeting and a problem is sorted out in one part of the constituency, the problem moves to another part, and we then have to have another public meeting to sort it out. The police are very helpful with short-term strategies, but we cannot go on like this. We have to have a proper strategic view to deal with this type of disorder.

A strategic view seems to be missing. I am not surprised that such a view is missing, as the Government are not paying any serious attention to it. They have not even mentioned it in their document, "Protecting the Public".

Another document that perhaps illustrates the problem is the Greater Manchester policing plan. Under a heading of "Public Reassurance", they state that the national objective is "to provide high visibility policing so as to reassure the public."

That reassurance is exactly what the public are asking for, which is a reflection of the public's concern that no longer is there law and order on the streets.

Greater Manchester police state that their target is:

"To achieve a 50 per cent. satisfaction level with levels of foot and mobile patrols."

A 50 per cent. satisfaction level would be an enormous rise in satisfaction, because currently there is no public satisfaction with police visibility. I do not blame the police for that, because they have to put their resources where the Home Office asks them to.

The Greater Manchester police have recognised the their difficulties with the public over disorder and have set a local objective, which is "to co-operate with young people, schools, parents and residents to promote community harmony."

That is an excellent objective, but I doubt whether the Home Office will give it any recognition or the necessary resources to accomplish it. There must be a great deal of resourcing if community policing is to be performed effectively. It takes up a lot of police time.

Mr. Howard: Is the hon. Lady aware that we have increased spending on the police by 100 per cent. in real terms since 1979? Is she aware that the country is rapidly getting fed up of Labour Back Benchers giving speeches in every debate in the House and outside, in which they complain about resources and ask for more money, while the shadow Chancellor and the shadow Chief Secretary go round the country saying, "You don't need to worry about your taxes because Labour will not spend any more money on anything"?

Ms Coffey: I am sorry that I annoyed the Home Secretary, but the truth is very painful. Whatever figure he gives about increasing police resources, ultimately the public are extremely fed up and very angry about the levels of disorder they have to put up with. The Home Secretary really should stop worrying about what Labour Back Benchers are telling him, and start worrying about and taking some note of what the public are trying to tell him.

The causes of disorder are very complex, and there are no simple solutions. We must have a short-term and a long-term strategy. We must ask what is the cause of disorder, particularly among young people. We must examine problems in the provision of leisure facilities and youth facilities, and listen to young people.

Perhaps there are other preventative measures that the Home Secretary could take. As he is probably aware, I am the co-chair of the British parliamentary lighting group. We have long been requesting the Home Office's acceptance that improved street lighting decreases crime levels and the fear of crime. That does not seem to have been accepted by the Home Secretary, although he accepts the effectiveness of closed-circuit television cameras in shopping centres—which are effective, but they are not appropriate for residential areas.

The Home Secretary must ensure that the police have the time to support crime prevention, such as the homewatch and streetwatch schemes. Many people are very willing to enter into partnerships and do what they can to make their neighbourhoods safe, but they need support. Police time is not available, because they have to deal with the enormous amount of crime.

Madam Speaker: Order. I regret having to call the hon. Lady to order.

Sir Jim Spicer (West Dorset): Madam Speaker, I gave you an undertaking that I shall be five minutes, and five minutes I will be—because I know that you will not allow me any longer.

I was delighted to hear the view of the Liberal party expressed so clearly by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I noted two points that he made: prison does not work; and we are looking for retribution. Yes, we are; and prison does work. Those are two points.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has been under some attack. He has very broad shoulders. I should like to tell him: by all means listen to the public, and also listen to the police.

I should just like to read a letter sent to The Times last week by my chief constable, the chief constable of Dorset. He said:

"Dear Sir,

"The Lord Chief Justice's condemnation of minimum sentencing (Times May 23rd) was a revealing insight into the workings of a very senior judicial mind.

"Having recognised the Home Secretary's determined attempt to respond to wide public concern for which the Lord Chief Justice acknowledged there is considerable support, he then goes on to state his preference for the allegedly unanimous, but opposite, views of those who 'work in the system' rather curiously omitting any reference to the police. We do have a little experience in these matters, but to ignore or dismiss the feelings and perceptions of the ordinary person in the street is much more serious.

"His comment that 'certainty in sentencing can only be achieved by sacrificing justice' is I believe altogether too sweeping. The new proposals are not aimed at first time offenders, crimes of passion or foolishness but to persistent offenders who are not being deterred by the criminal justice system at present. Anyone who has had 'cheek by jowl' contact with persistent criminals over the years knows that the one sentence they hate more than any other is prison. Despite their displays of bravado when questioned on the subject most would sell their grannies to avoid it. However the courts regularly save them that inconvenience by allowing them to 'beat the system' even when convicted.

"In my view unlimited judicial discretion in sentencing burglars in particular, is robbing the criminal justice system of its deterrent value and undermining the delivery of justice in the eyes of ordinary law abiding citizens. The Lord Chief Justice in defence of his sentencing discretion suggests that 'the value of the theft, the lapse of time between arrests, how many offences have been committed, whether it was drunken opportunism and the effect on the victim should all be considered'. This is precisely where the delivery of 'Justice' is going wrong, it is focusing too much on the circumstances of the offender and not enough on the victim.

"Who is to judge the 'value' of a theft? How many times is it suggested than 'drunken opportunism' be regarded as tolerable? Should the persistent offender benefit from some mitigation in sentence because he didn't manage to steal very much or because he has evaded arrest for months or years, or because the hapless victim has often bravely carried on their life without outward sign of injury? This just does not make sense, any more than the referral to the cliche 'that what really deters criminals is the certainty of arrest and detection'.

"Detection and arrest alone for the regulars are no more than a temporary irritation, without the certainty of a deterrent sentence and that means prison. If the American experience is that they are all pleading 'not guilty' then discount the sentence to encourage a 'guilty' plea but ensure that they still go to prison!

"Finally I am astonished at the way that his Lordship has misdirected himself in relation to the relevance of the burglary detection rate, which he quotes as 3 in 20, and then seeks to use as evidence to invalidate a 'minimum sentencing' policy because so few offences come to court. This is a complete misunderstanding of the crime figures.

"It is now well established that a small percentage of persistent criminals commit a disproportionately large amount of crime. So reference to the number of offences that come to court completely misses the point. Modern police investigation techniques target known and active criminals and they are being caught and prosecuted over and over again, but for only a fraction of the offences they commit. Unlimited judicial discretion which is over-focused on the offender is not providing deterrent sentences. The system really must stop patronising criminals with misplaced sympathy and talk of rehabilitation when they chose to commit crime for greed, excitement and peer group status. Treat them as adults with minds of their own and make them, not the victims, understand the fear and consequences of crime.

"Yours faithfully,

"Chief Constable."

That, Home Secretary, is the message from the people of this country. Ignore the waffling that we always get from the Opposition, which I have had to listen to for 24 years.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): In that case, it is obvious that the hon. Member for West Dorset (Sir J. Spicer) has not listened to or understood a great deal while he has been sitting here.

This has been an extraordinary debate. Not only did the Home Secretary try, by publishing another White Paper, to distract attention from the White Paper that he had chosen to debate, but he was joined on the Government Front Bench by the Secretary of State for Scotland, whose published proposals on sentencing are quite different from those of the Home Secretary. What a way of running what was supposed to be a crime week, intended to regain the initiative from the Labour party.

Crime Week has been a disaster for the Home Secretary. That was bound to happen, not only because he seems to get everything wrong, but because the difference between the two parties is that the Labour party is serious about tackling crime. The country knows that, and will see it when we are in government.

We have heard the White Paper torn apart by the former Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd), who said that the Home Secretary's proposals would be visibly unjust and counter-productive, would not do much for deterrence, and needed sensible rethinking.

From the criticisms both inside and outside the House, it is clear that, although the Home Secretary has now woken up to the problem on which the Labour party has focused for a considerable number of years, his White Paper is less robust than the proposals that my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), the shadow Home Secretary, has already published, and does not stand up to the same scrutiny.

Indeed, the Home Secretary was so concerned not to give credit to my hon. Friend that he put himself into the absurd position of defending the presence of eight and nine-year-olds on the street well into the night. He tried to wriggle out of it by saying that the police already have the power to act, but he is wrong, except in very specific and limited circumstances. Anybody who has come across the problems in practice knows that that is not the case.

One police superintendent said that he supported

"proposals aimed at keeping vulnerable youngsters off the streets at night and away from potential criminal activity".

He agreed, as many youth workers have, about encouraging and enabling parents to take proper responsibility for the care and control of their children, and continued:

"We are happy to discuss the curfew proposal, but some form of legislation would be required before we had any power to impose such a blanket measure and extensive consultation with the community would also be needed".

That is precisely what my hon. Friend proposed, which is in general a sensible way of tackling a real problem.

During the debate the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) gave loyal but misguided support to the Home Secretary. But the hon. Gentleman does not take crime in the community as seriously as did his predecessor, and we look forward to the return of John P. Smith at the general election.

I share with the hon. Gentleman the police division of the Vale of Glamorgan, and I am pleased that we now have extra police on the streets. However, it was the Secretary of State for Wales who for several years denied the South Wales police the cash they needed, so it is foolish for a Conservative Member to draw attention to the Government's failure in that regard. It is also foolish for Conservative Members to talk about the Government's record on police numbers, as the Home Secretary did when he intervened desperately on my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey), despite the short time available to her, because he did not seem to have confidence in his Minister of State.

In the run-up to the 1992 general election the Government promised an extra 1,000 police officers, but what has happened since March 1992? By 30 September 1995 the number of police officers had decreased by 860. What a record. The Home Secretary has nothing to be proud of in connection with police numbers and with his support of the police.

The hon. Members for Vale of Glamorgan and for Milton Keynes, North–East (Mr. Butler) were both signatories to the report of the Home Affairs Select Committee which demanded statutory regulation of the private security industry. I am surprised that neither of them has been consistent enough to demand its implementation in the debate.

Today's White Paper would allow employers access to criminal records. That is sensible, especially with violent offenders and sex offenders who might wheedle their way into working with children. But the police and the private security industry, as well as the Labour party, have demanded statutory regulation to protect the public against rogue crooked employers too.

By bringing in only half the prescription, the Home Secretary will allow crooked employers, about which we have already given evidence, access to the records of those whom they seek to employ. The Mafia would be delighted with such an arrangement. We keep being told that the Home Secretary is still considering the Select Committee's report, but when the Home Office gave evidence to the Select Committee, its representatives said that it was not really interested, and did not support the idea of statutory regulation. Is it not true that the Home Secretary is unwilling to provide, or is prevented by his Cabinet colleagues from providing, the statutory regulation needed to protect the public?

Anyone who has followed the events or the long-drawn-out investigations in north Wales knows, even if the full report does not reach the public domain, that paedophiles plotted and planned the systematic abuse of children. To allow people in positions of influence as employers in the public or private sector to know details about sex offenders, without themselves being investigated, is surely a recipe for disaster.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) feared that listing acquittals would allow rumour to have the force of a conviction. That is a difficult area, but the level of conviction for child sex offences is very low, and the fact that so few offences come to light is a scandal. We need to do more to protect children against the predators. Yet in recent weeks the Conservatives blocked a Bill to establish a register of paedophiles.

Given the overwhelming evidence that paedophiles are the most devious and cunning people in the world, as well as the most despicable, and given the evidence from "The Cook Report" that most child sex offenders expect to reoffend on release, and use their time in prison reflecting on past abuse and planning future abuse, it is an absolute scandal that only last week the Home Secretary led Conservative Members into the Lobby to defeat amendments to the law which would have helped to protect children by preventing witness statements and photographic evidence from circulating in prison as a stimulus to future offences.

Belatedly, the Conservative party has woken up to the disastrous level of crime, to its impact on ordinary people, and to the fact that Conservatives are no longer believed by the public. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) condemned the Government for taking 17 years to get round to tackling crime. He was right, but he then went on to make a total fool of himself by trying to blame the Labour party for the failures of the past 17 years.

We shall take no lessons from that hon. Gentleman, who by his own admission has not taken an interest in law and order debates for many years. We shall take no lessons from a Conservative party that has yet to apologise for the introduction of the poll tax. As somebody who has been a magistrate since 1972, and has worked successfully for many years on projects to reduce crime in my constituency and in the rest of my area, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that I did not discover crime and the need for clarity of punishment when I entered the House—and nor did many of my hon. Friends.

I can tell the hon. Gentleman and his constituents this: the leader of the Labour party was right to promise to be tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime. Under a Government led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), with my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn as Home Secretary, that will become a national strategy rather than a mere promise by the Labour party, and it will be welcomed by the police and the public alike.

The Conservative party is condemned by its own record. The level of crime is twice as high as when the Conservatives came into office; only one offence in 50 leads to punishment by a court; only one in 750 leads to a punishment involving a custodial sentence. We need the practical and comprehensive policies of the Labour party to nip young offending in the bud, to tackle violence, to deal with nuisance neighbours, and to introduce consistency of sentencing in a way that will work, instead of doing as the Government do when they have to amend their own legislation every other year—and indeed, sometimes almost in the course of a single year.

[Mr. Alun Michael]

The Home Secretary said earlier that it was the first duty of Government to maintain law and order, and to allow citizens to walk the streets in safety and to sleep securely in their beds at night. Yes, but the Conservative Government have failed to provide that safety and security. Since they came into office they have presided over not only a doubling in the level of recorded crime, but an increase of 151 per cent. in crimes of violence and an increase of 448 per cent. in robbery. They have no right to claim virtue in relation to law and order.

The Government have failed, yet they continually seek to pin the blame on the Labour party, which, although it seems to have escaped the Home Secretary's notice, has not been in office for the past 17 years. They seem to find refuge in a mantra of inaccuracies provided by Tory central office. But, if one reads the record that we published this week, one will see that on occasion after occasion, it is Labour that has come forward with constructive proposals, Labour that has supported the Government when they are right and criticised them when they are wrong, and Labour that will be tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime when in office.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): I am glad that the debate was ended by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) in the same farcical mode as his hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) began it. Labour Members have made some extraordinary comments today. They are not quite sure which way to turn, whether to keep up with the rhetoric of being tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime or to condemn some of our proposals and support some colleagues in the other place. They just do not know what way to squirm. We shall find out in 10 minutes what Labour will do about our proposals.

At one point, the hon. Member for Blackburn implied that he was worried that the longer prison sentences that we propose would not be brought in soon enough. Does anyone seriously believe that the Labour party, which does not believe in the private finance initiative or building prisons more rapidly, will build prisons faster than the Conservative Government would to enable that policy to be implemented more speedily? It is so farcical.

Mr. Michael: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclean: No, I will not.

Mr. Michael rose—

Mr. Maclean: Sit down.

I turn to criminal injuries compensation. I am not going to lecture the Opposition, I merely want to inform my hon. Friends, in case they were worried or were taken in for a moment by the hon. Member for Blackburn, who said that the criminal injuries compensation measures on which we voted a few months ago could have led to cuts in such compensation. Here are the figures for the past five years: in 1990-91, £109 million was paid out, in 1991-92 the figure was £143 million, in 1992-93 it was £152 million, in 1993-94 it was £165 million, and in 1994-95 it was £175 million.

Mr. Michael rose—

Mr. Maclean: No, I will not give way. Now, the year of cuts—

Mr. Michael: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Minister ignores the fact that there were £700 million-worth of cuts in the Criminal Injuries Compensation Bill.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a point of order. He is being very mischievous.

Mr. Maclean: As I said, Labour Members are squirming tonight and will go for any sort of abuse.

I say to my hon. Friends, what about the year of cuts? In 1994-95 we paid out £175 million, but last year, the Government paid out £183 million to the victims of crime: the highest and most generous compensation scheme of any country in the world except the United States.

I listened carefully to the thoughtful speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd). He said that he was worried that some drug addicts and burglars might be imprisoned after their third offence and there might be some unfairness on occasions. Such people will have two chances beforehand. They will not receive a minimum sentence for the first conviction.

Some people might share the view that it would be a little unfortunate if those who are simply passing on a cannabis cigarette or whatever were sent to prison, but we are not dealing with cannabis. Drug dealers who will be liable to a minimum sentence are those who are dealing in class A drugs. If someone is convicted for a third time for selling crack or cocaine, I have no sympathy for such a person being sent to prison. Have we not heard of so many tragic occasions in the past few years of people dying through drugs—not because they got them from professional dealers but because they bought a tablet from a so-called friend? On resources, I refer my right hon. Friend to chapter 13 of the White Paper, which sets out the details.

I agree entirely with the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North–East (Mr. Butler), who pointed out the tremendous success in deterring driving and drink-driving offences. The threat of imprisonment through the totting-up procedure has worked wonders. He gave excellent support for the Government's proposals, and I totally support what he said.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours) knows that I cannot comment on the details of the constituency case that he mentioned, but I sincerely hope that his constituent will find some comfort from his public support of her today. If a Member of Parliament can publicly support her, I hope that others in his constituency will have the courage to do likewise.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) promoted what my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) described as the producer view. I must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Criminal Justice Act 1991 was not designed to stop people going to prison but to ensure that prison and proper tough community sentences were given equal consideration and that each was used when and where appropriate. He was worried about shorter sentences. Let me tell him, we already have shorter sentences, but they are dishonest. They are not what is pronounced in court. The prisoner does not serve that. We are merely trying to bring in some honesty.

There is a myth that rapists will find no option but—

Mr. Straw rose—

Mr. Maclean: I want to conclude this point. The hon. Gentleman had 35 minutes and failed to make his points. He is not going to steal my remaining seven or eight minutes.

Mr. Straw rose—

Mr. Maclean: I will not give way.

A myth has grown that rapists may as well kill the victims. It is still a myth even if great men repeat it. As soon as the Lord Chief Justice made that point, I checked with experts in the Home Office research department and asked them to trawl the literature on the subject. From the literature that we have studied, there is no suggestion whatever that that is the likely course rapists will take in future because it would require a perfectly calm, logical rapist, who in the moment of rape took a legally correct decision to kill the victim. We have looked at the available research—much is American—but can find no research whatever to suggest that rapists are more likely to kill their victim.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) made a good point that community sentences have higher reoffending rates than prison. That point needs to be made very clearly. One of the myths that has grown over the years is that prisons are universities of crime. The real universities of crime are the street corners, where the practicals can be carried out immediately.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk congratulated the police on their excellent funding settlement in Suffolk and elsewhere.

The Opposition today could quote only some of their Lordships in the other place who come to their rescue as their allies. I find it extraordinarily rich that, in a debate on law and order, the Opposition can rely only on support from some of their Lordships in another place, which the Opposition propose to abolish if they are ever elected to form a Government. Our proposals are supported by people the length and breadth of the country, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset made clear. It is the first time that I have heard a chief constable's speech in this House and I would like to hear more of them.

It is quite clear that today's debate has highlighted the divide between the Conservative party and the Labour party. We have set out clear, considered and concrete proposals, which will help to protect the public from persistent and dangerous criminals and have the wholehearted support of the police. Over there on the Opposition Benches sit members of the Labour party—a party totally opposed to our proposals, but too frightened to openly and honestly admit it. The hon. Member for Blackburn has ducked and dived and dodged and weaved today in a pathetic attempt to avoid alienating either his Back Benchers or the public—hence the extraordinary Opposition amendment on which we shall be voting in a few minutes. Opposition Front-Bench Members will be reassuring their hon. Friends that they are voting against the Tory proposals. At the same time, the spin doctors are reassuring the press that the Labour party really does support the Home Secretary's proposals.

The Labour party has tried to debate anything other than the proposals set out in the White Paper. Their so-called strategy for crime is not worthy of the name. I reckon that Labour Members must pray that smoking is never banned because, if it is, it would deprive them of the fag packets on which they need to work out their future policies.

The Labour party talks about crime prevention and about a six-year old report which proposed giving local authorities a statutory duty to undertake crime prevention. While Labour talks, we have been empowering local partnerships up and down the country to install closed circuit television and to promote neighbourhood watch. Labour talks about promoting and supporting the police. We heard the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth say that he was worried about the number of police officers since the last election. We now have 2,000 more constables than we had before the last election. When we came to office in—

It being Seven o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question necessary to dispose of proceedings on the motion, pursuant to Order [7 June].

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House supports the proposals set out in the White Paper 'Protecting the Public' to introduce automatic life sentences for serious violent and sex offenders; mandatory minimum prison sentences for persistent house burglars and drug dealers; and to introduce greater honesty into the sentencing process.

Northern Ireland

7.15 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 4th June, be approved.

Once more I need to come to the House to seek authority for the renewal of the current provisions for the government of Northern Ireland by direct rule. I regret that this is needed. These arrangements are far from what is ideal in a democracy, but there is as yet in Northern Ireland no broad enough base of agreement for any other system, including any system founded on greater local responsibility, so we must renew direct rule.

At last, however, after long endeavour, a process of inclusive political negotiations has begun. It moves us closer to the goal of establishing a sufficiently agreed system for the future. In the House tonight there will be as strong a wish that these negotiations shall succeed as there will be recognition that direct rule must continue until they do.

No less strong, I reckon, will be a universal desire to express our outraged condemnation of what was perpetrated in Manchester on Saturday, which is directly relevant to this debate because it took place after the negotiations had begun. Those were negotiations that Sinn Fein could have entered, to sit with other political parties, for which the electorate had voted. They could have sat down with the rest on 10 June. But there was no renunciation of violence by the IRA, with whom they are so inextricably linked; no restoration of a ceasefire that should never have been abandoned, so they excluded themselves, just as they separately absented themselves—by their own decision—from the elected forum last Friday.

Instead, there was from the IRA a calculated declaration of their mind set. They declared on Saturday that their route to political change is the violent, not the democratic, route. The political process did not reject them: they rejected it. They showed that they have as yet no stomach for the disciplines of democracy. Therefore they tried to get what they want by denying random members of the public their most fundamental human rights. And, of course, they threaten more of the same, in Northern Ireland no less than in Great Britain.

That is exactly the kind of duress that this House and this Government, together with the Irish Government, have set our faces against.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Secretary of State, based on his experience, accept that the concessions gained after atrocities have been an incentive to Sinn Fein-IRA to continue along the same path as they have adopted in the past? Does he agree that the deliberate murder of a member of the Garda was, in effect, a Harvey Smith signal thrown at John Bruton in the Republic?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I agree, of course, with the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. It was a wicked and wholly unjustified action. I do not doubt that it was intended to convey the message that the hon. Gentleman has described.

[Sir Patrick Mayhew]

I recognise no concessions to the IRA. Both Governments have made it clear that, through their political party, the IRA have to demonstrate that they are wholly committed to peaceful and democratic means. Until that comes about, there can be no participation for their political party in the negotiations. I acknowledge that the Government, in response to representations from numerous quarters, have changed their position on matters that have not concerned principle. We have done so in order—as we hoped—to demonstrate a sensible flexibility, not a willingness to move on points of principle.

I was saying that the IRA have tried to get their way by denying the most fundamental human rights to random members of the public—a kind of duress against which this House, the British Government and the Irish Government have made it clear that we will set our faces. We will not sit opposite people who imply there is more where the Manchester bomb came from unless we deliver across the table what they want.

That is why, after the South Quay attack on 9 February, we jointly declared that, for Sinn Fein, as an elected party, to enter negotiations, there had first to be an unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994. After 9 February, numerous further attacks have been made, culminating last Saturday at Manchester. But our rejection of duress stands, and it is, if possible, fortified.

We are not going to be satisfied with some tactical remission of violence. A purported restoration of the ceasefire last Monday, for example, anticipated by many commentators, would have been seen across the world as a cynical and callous ploy.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): I am reassured to hear my right hon. and learned Friend suggest that an unequivocal ceasefire is necessary, but will he tell the House what exactly he means by unequivocal and, on this occasion, what exactly he means by ceasefire?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I offer my hon. Friend a definition that I offered in this House some time ago. Unequivocal means of no other interpretation. For our part, we endorse the words of Mr. Bruton, whose support we gratefully acknowledge. It is for Sinn Fein and the IRA to find the words and the deeds to convince us, and the world, that violence is over: not tactically, not temporarily, but totally, over. I reiterate what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in the House yesterday:

> "If the IRA and Sinn Fein wish to have any future interest in this process, they will clearly need to declare an unequivocal ceasefire. They will need to declare it immediately. They will also have to show that that ceasefire is credible and lasting, and is not just a tactical device to enable them to enter the talks until such time as it is convenient for them to leave. It is now up to them to demonstrate their credibility; it is not up to us or anyone else. They must demonstrate their credibility—but the talks will continue."—[Official Report, 18 June 1996; Vol. 279, c. 680-81.]

They have mightily increased the difficulty of that task, if indeed they really wish to set their hands to it.

The Government, however, are not going to give Sinn Fein the satisfaction of saying that in no foreseeable circumstances could they succeed. We still do not believe that to be the case. The position remains as it has been: Sinn Fein have not been excluded; they exclude themselves. They must find words and the deeds to let themselves in, to convince the rest of us that violence is over for good. It is for them to establish such confidence in any ceasefire statement that they may make.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Are we not moving back to August 1994, and the arguments that told us that violence was over for good?

Would it not be more effective now to take a more political path? Twenty-one years have passed since this sort of legislation came into being. Twenty-one is usually regarded as the time when people come of age and take responsibility. Is it not time the House began to take responsibility for governing Northern Ireland in the same way as it governs the rest of the United Kingdom? We need not wait for the Scots to make up their minds how they want to be governed.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I said at the beginning that we have to renew direct rule because there is no sufficiently agreed basis for any other system, including any system involving greater local accountability. One possible foreseeable system is the type to which the hon. Gentleman has just alluded—sometimes called a wholly integrated system of government. That is not excluded from the ambit of the talks that are now commencing. But for any alternative to direct rule there needs to be a broad enough basis of agreement to make it stick.

Meanwhile, I wish to urge that it is of the highest importance that the old cycle of retaliation violence be not resumed. I pay tribute to the restraint and wisdom of those described as the combined loyalist military command for not allowing themselves to be provoked into abandoning their own ceasefire. In consequence, the loyalist parties have not excluded themselves from the negotiations, where they are now participating valuably and fully and thereby fulfilling the wishes of those who voted for them on 30 May.

I shall give a brief account of our stewardship in the past year. The first duty of any Government is the protection of their citizens, so I turn first to security policy. Since the ending of the ceasefire, a prudent guard was kept up, but security measures were adjusted to meet a reduced threat of violence. There is no doubt that this has improved the amenities of life for people in Northern Ireland enormously, but nothing was taken away that could not very soon be replaced.

Accordingly, yesterday, and again today, as a direct consequence of the IRA's terrorist threat, there was massive disruption of traffic in Northern Ireland and doubtless great inconvenience caused to the public. But I know that the people of Northern Ireland will always desire and expect the security forces to make whatever precautionary checks are needed, and to take all other steps within the law that the threat of terrorism may show to be needed.

For what my experience in Northern Ireland—four and a quarter years of it—is worth, I think nothing is going to induce any slackening of people's resolve within Northern Ireland to face down the obscene duress of terrorism. Therefore, so long as terrorism remains a threat to Northern Ireland's stability, the Government will meet it with a fully robust security policy. We shall base ourselves upon the excellent co-operation we enjoy in security matters with the Irish authorities, and where possible we shall seek with them to enhance it. As in Great Britain, so in Northern Ireland, we shall be ready to adopt all lawful measures that new circumstances may require.

I want to express our gratitude to the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and to the other security forces who support them, for their work. It is demanding and incessant. Over the past year, terrorist units have remained intact. Targeting, training, researching weapons and violent intimidation have all continued. There is continuing evidence of paramilitary involvement in drug dealing and racketeering. Murders have been carried out by terrorist organisations under the veil of action against drugs. Punishment beatings have been carried out regularly, revolting in their nature and extent. They have been carried out by both sides, and the number of victims has risen during the year.

All that will continue to be resolutely countered. If I were so advised, the third battalion, which was relocated after the ceasefire, would be returned to duty in support of the RUC in the Province. There will be no let-up—instead, many discontinued measures may have to be restored. As hon. Members would expect, neither cost nor the financial stringency that may result in other quarters of the administration of Northern Ireland will be allowed to impede the effort against terrorism.

As for economic progress, there is clear evidence of a further improvement in the performance of the Northern Ireland economy over the past year, even in comparison with the excellent performance of Great Britain. Over the year, unemployment has fallen to its lowest level for more than 14 years, employment has reached an all-time high and manufacturing output has continued to rise. Exports by Northern Ireland manufacturing firms have out-performed the United Kingdom as a whole, and inward investment is rising steadily. Tourism has reached a record high.

There are good grounds for confidence in the economic future of Northern Ireland. Political progress offers the prospect of yet more attractive developments. There is enormous potential in Northern Ireland for economic growth and for broadly shared prosperity. In the past year, part of that potential has been realised—the best is yet to come.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I received a response from the Northern Ireland Office that there had been 30 objections to the possibility of the Europe Tool Company investing in Northern Ireland. Does the Secretary of State agree that it is rather strange that British companies that purchase from the parent company in South Korea object to British people manufacturing the equipment? It would be a wonderful investment for the United Kingdom economy, particularly in Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The hon. Member for Belfast, South is his usual charitable self in saying that it is rather strange.

I refer now to political progress. Intense efforts have been made to secure the beginning of political talks on an inclusive basis. As hon. Members know, the talks began, on schedule, on 10 June. The Government welcome Senator Mitchell's assumption of the chair at the opening plenary session, and the appointment of General de Chastelain and Mr. Holkeri as chairman of strand 2 and the business committee and alternate chairman respectively. I express our deep appreciation of the selfless willingness of these distinguished gentlemen to help.

All nine parties presently participating in this political process have formally affirmed their commitment to the six principles of democracy and non-violence set out in the report of the international body that had been chaired by Senator Mitchell. However well the participants' democratic credentials were already established, I believe that it was an important step for them to reaffirm those principles—and they have done so. We would require the same of Sinn Fein if it succeeds in lifting its self-imposed exclusion.

I believe that these talks can succeed. We have come a long way already, but we must go a great deal further. There have been significant shifts in thinking in recent years among many of those present in the negotiations. The participants arrive at the negotiations with a mandate from their electors to take part to the full in the process. There is clearly a deep wish among the population of Northern Ireland—and, indeed, among all the people of these islands—after years of conflict, for a lasting peace and for consolidation of all the advantages and opportunities of which we have had a foretaste since the ceasefires.

The process commands much international support—I believe that there is much to welcome and nothing to suspect in that. As we have repeatedly made clear, the way forward lies in the hands of the participants. However, it bodes well for Northern Ireland, in the context of any future settlement, that there is such a high degree of positive international understanding. In looking back to the enthusiasm and delight with which the visit of President Clinton was greeted, I believe that the people of Northern Ireland understand that.

An important complement to the talks will be the elected forum, which had its first meeting last Friday—14 June. As has been made clear, it has no authority over the negotiations—it is a purely deliberative body. We see its usefulness lying in its ability to debate ways forward in the development of dialogue and understanding between the communities in Northern Ireland, and more broadly. It can do this with the benefit of the views of a wide range of interests that might be invited to address it—many of whom may be outside the political sphere. I am most grateful to Mr. John Gorman for agreeing to take on the sensitive role of the forum's interim chairman, and I wish it well.

I have set out our hopes for the negotiations and for the future well-being of Northern Ireland, which in many ways turns on them. We are likely to have months of discussion ahead—indeed, I hope that we do. It is unlikely to be a rapid process, and it may often be a rough and uncomfortable one. The rewards of the process are potentially great for all sections of the community in Northern Ireland. Indeed, the welfare of people in both islands is intimately bound up with the settlement that we hope to reach and to put to the people in a referendum.

There is a great responsibility on all of us who are involved in the negotiations. Sinn Fein could have been a part of the negotiations, had the IRA not abandoned its ceasefire. Sinn Fein could have joined the negotiations last week, but the IRA chose not to restore the ceasefire and to bomb the people in Manchester instead. The talks will continue—with or without Sinn Fein. The IRA can destroy the prospects of Sinn Fein—the other side of its coin—being a part of the talks process, but the IRA cannot destroy the talks process.

I hope that we shall soon have a more satisfactory basis for administration in Northern Ireland. Until then, however, we must renew the current arrangements. I commend the draft order to the House.

7.37 pm

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Tonight, we have come to the House to renew the Northern Ireland Act 1974 at a time when many of the Northern Ireland Members of Parliament are working in Belfast, trying to move the talks process forward. We have come here in an atmosphere of sadness and grave disappointment. Our thoughts must be with the victims, and their families, of Saturday's sickening terrorist attack in Manchester. We commend their courage, and the courage of all the people of that town, as they continue the huge task of clearing up after the devastation of the IRA bomb.

When the Secretary of State sums up this evening, it might be helpful if he would tell us about any special arrangements or compensation that might be available to those who live and work in and around the Arndale centre in Manchester.

The Labour party has nothing but outright condemnation and contempt for the callous individuals who mounted this attack and for the cowards who sanctioned it. Had it not been for the professionalism of the police in clearing the area and for sheer good fortune, dozens of people could have lost their lives.

Those who carried out this act must be brought to justice swiftly. We are delighted with the response from the public in support of the police in their investigations. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said on Saturday:

"If the IRA think they can shift the resolve of any Government with this action they are cruelly mistaken."

After the bombing in Manchester, it is up to Sinn Fein to convince us that it has a commitment to the peace process. It is up to Sinn Fein to say and do whatever is necessary to restore what confidence it can in its shattered credibility. It is a tribute to the determination of the leaders of the loyalist community that its ceasefire has been maintained.

When the bomb exploded at Canary Wharf on 9 February, killing Inan Bashir and John Jeffries, the two Governments pledged their determination to continue the search for peace. Their concerted efforts produced the communiqué of 28 February, which detailed the route to the all-party talks on 10 June. Not everyone agreed with that route—we understand why—but everyone followed it.

The agreed stance adopted by the British and the Irish Governments demonstrated its worth once again this week. We welcome and fully support the two Governments' determination to continue the talks process. In view of the public anger about the appalling murder of Garda McCabe in the Republic of Ireland, we acknowledge the Irish Government's decision to keep under review their official level contacts with Sinn Fein. They are asking very important questions, to which we all want a response.

The optimum result is a peace process that is as inclusive as possible. Although that is impossible at the moment, we must keep alive the possibility of inclusive dialogue at some point in the future. Following the important and welcome progress today, I hope that the talks in Belfast will continue with those parties who demonstrate, day in and day out, their commitment to peace and democracy. If Sinn Fein cannot do that, as the Secretary of State said this evening, the process must continue without them.

This annual debate has often taken place in exceptional circumstances—as it does again this evening—but it is concerned primarily with the Secretary of State's stewardship of Northern Ireland affairs in the past 12 months. In the absence of a new agreed settlement, decisions continue to be taken at a distance from the people of Northern Ireland in a manner that is not accountable. The absence of an agreement in Northern Ireland means that the centralisation of decision making in Westminster persists. When a policy is mistaken or when the Government mishandle a situation, people and businesses in Northern Ireland suffer, but their influence is limited.

For an example, we need look no further than the chaos and confusion surrounding the current beef crisis. Northern Ireland farmers should compare favourably with their counterparts in Britain if the framework before the European Union is accepted. Some 90 per cent. of the herds in Northern Ireland are grass-fed, there is a low incidence of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, and a traceability system is in place. I have not read the details of the agreement announced on the news this evening, but it appears to be very general. It seems as though reference must be made to the veterinary committee every time the process moves forward. I do not think that it will make a big difference to the beef farmers in Northern Ireland, many of whom face disaster.

The privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity is another case in point. The current level of profits and prices are against consumer interests in Northern Ireland. A Monopolies and Mergers Commission referral is long overdue and the Government must account to the people of Northern Ireland for that delay. Furthermore, this year's Budget contained a nasty sting for training providers. Groups face cuts of between 25 and 40 per cent. after the adult community employment reductions. The Government pulled a further £2 million out of the hat, but only after sustained pressure.

Given the appalling level of unemployment in Northern Ireland—which costs taxpayers more than £300 million per year—it is economically and socially short-sighted to cut training schemes, especially when alternative plans, such as the community work programme, are struggling to get going. The Government's misplaced priorities are affecting key services in Northern Ireland.

Mismanagement has also proved a problem in the past year with the rise and rise of bureaucracy in the health service. Budget cuts are plunging the Northern Ireland health trusts into crisis only three months into the financial year. Northern Ireland's hospitals are gearing up for a summer of chaos. Hospitals such as the Royal Victoria in Belfast or Musgrave Park face theatre closures and cuts in the number of beds and jobs. Patient care will suffer and bureaucracy will escalate—that is the outcome of the Government's health policies.

When ideology triumphs over common sense, services suffer, money is wasted and the concerns of local people—citizens, consumers, business people and community representatives—are ignored. Sadly, that problem is not exclusive to the Government's stewardship in Northern Ireland—far from it. It is a symptom of a deeper malaise throughout the United Kingdom of a Government who are distant from and out of touch with the people.

Unless there is an agreement between the parties and consent is granted for a new settlement, the order will come before the House in the same form next year. A general election will intervene between now and then. If no agreement is reached and if a Labour Government are proposing the renewal of the order, we shall implement different policies from those that we are reviewing this year.

Labour has made it unequivocally clear that there can be no change in the constitutional status of Northern Ireland without the consent of a majority of its people. It seems clear to me that an acceptance of that principle of consent means that Northern Ireland will continue as part of the United Kingdom for a long time into the future. There is clearly not consent among Unionists for a united Ireland and it is equally clear that Northern Ireland's existing status does not command the consent of nationalists. That is why we need new arrangements and structures that both communities can support. As we have said on previous occasions, Labour wants to see reconciliation between the two communities and between the two parts of Ireland—north and south—on the basis of consent.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I press the hon. Lady on that point. First, talk about two communities is often interpreted as division on the grounds of religion, but can people with opposing nationality claims share the same objectives? Secondly, the costs of generating electricity in Northern Ireland are a real problem and I understand that the contract will remain in place until 2002. Is the hon. Lady giving a commitment on behalf of her party that a Labour Government would reduce electricity generation costs in Northern Ireland?

Ms Mowlam: As to the hon. Gentleman's last point, the nature of those costs will be put before the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that the contract extends until 2002. However, we shall refer it to the MMC and, we hope, it will be dealt with. As to the hon. Gentleman's first point about the two communities and those with different national identities reaching some kind of agreement, he and I and the House should address that issue together. The hon. Gentleman's views and his ability to find ways to co-operate and to build consensus between the two communities are a crucial part of the equation.

Reconciliation between the two communities need not, as he suggests, be rooted in territory, in flags or in domination. It must be based on respect and therefore on an acceptance of each community's allegiances to Ireland or Britain and to Europe. That involves building agreement around institutions that all can share and that fully respect people's sense of allegiance to one nation or another.

That approach embraces the principles of the joint framework document which—together with the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the Downing Street declaration—Labour recognises is a milestone on the road to peace. They are a testament to the commitment of the two Governments to work closely together in order to make progress in the search for peace. Labour would continue that work with the Irish Government and the Northern Ireland parties in order to reach a balanced settlement through negotiation and agreement.

If any party believes that it will get a better deal from Labour in the negotiations—assuming that we will be prepared to bully or to pressure a particular community in order to reach a settlement—it is badly mistaken. We support and uphold the principle of consent. We repudiate and reject the politics of threat and coercion. We will continue the talks, given the chance, in pursuit of agreement. We will uphold Labour's principles, which are, in essence, about justice, fairness and common sense.

We will also apply those principles in other parts of policy, such as policing. Our proposals improve significantly on those from the Government. For example, we have suggested the election of representatives to the police authority; assigning responsibility for implementing change; and progress in changing the composition of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Our principles of fairness and justice will apply to anti-discrimination and fair employment proposals. We have made a detailed submission to the review of fair employment being undertaken at present by the Standing Advisory Committee on Human Rights. There is also a clear Labour commitment on human rights. We have made clear our commitment to the incorporation of the European convention on human rights into law in Northern Ireland, as in Britain, and we will work with the parties—which I hope will be working together already—to develop and introduce a Bill of Rights.

We will complete our consultations and introduce policies that will have a real impact on the day-to-day lives of people in Northern Ireland in areas such as the economy, welfare changes and nursery provision. After the vote in another place earlier this week, we hope that the nursery vouchers scheme, which would destroy chances of nursery education, can be stopped in time to provide decent places for three and four-year-olds.

One sensitive subject, proposals on which should be considered and debated more fully, is that of marches and parades. I have spoken and written often to the Secretary of State on that matter. Obviously, there are no simple answers, but we believe that the Government could give their view on the proposals that have been made by ourselves and others in recent weeks. The proposals include the establishment of an independent advisory group to inform the Secretary of State—not to dictate to him—of possible steps to reduce tensions and meet community concerns; the possibility of prescribing guidelines for the conduct of parades in disputed areas; and a system of prior planning permission, as has been recently proposed. It would be interesting if the Government would respond to those suggestions this evening.

I have said clearly tonight that no one should wait for Labour to make a difference in the negotiations. I hope that I have shown, by our criticisms of the Secretary of State's stewardship in the past year and by our policy commitments, that, given the chance, our policies would make a difference to people's lives in Northern Ireland. We believe that the practical policies that I have outlined tonight would make a difference to all communities in their day-to-day lives. For now, we support and encourage the Government in continuing to try to take the talks process forward. We will do all that we can to help and support them in that task.

7.52 pm

Sir James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): I owe it to the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) to follow her on the key phrase she used—"the principle of consent". On the one word "consent", all else that we will consider tonight turns. It is the crucial term and, in some ways, is the only issue that should concern us in coming days.

My respectful advice to the hon. Lady would be that, if we seek consent in the political sense, we should not start with a high-wire act. The media of the world are orchestrated by Mr. Adams who has now become a television producer, given the way he managed and choreographed the photographs at the gate, which was not barred or locked, and the rehearsal that produced those magnificent pictures from the gullible news industry. I dismiss the mistaken idea that, when seeking to achieve consent, one should start with a blaze of glory and a tooting of trumpets on the high-wire act, because, instead of making progress, one falls off.

The fact that I am a modest man with much to be modest about teaches me that the only way to make progress is to go down the scale of options until we find the lowest level at which consent can be maintained. When we have done that, we can then start patiently building on the consent thus obtained, but right hon. and hon. Members should not imagine that we can do it the other way around.

Had this debate been held a week earlier, it would probably have been difficult for any hon. Member to express honestly held views about the farce of what my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) has termed the 21st annual interim period extension device, which we are debating tonight, and how it could be replaced by some practical, permanent method of governing one of the four components of the United Kingdom. We would have been told a week ago to hold our horses, not to stir the situation or to reach for the impossible because devolution is just around the corner. The events of the past seven days have swept away all the inhibitions of two decades. We cannot now be silenced by exhortations to give peace a chance; to win the battle for hearts and minds; or to turn a blind eye to perceived concessions to terrorists in the expectation that those terrorists would be placated by perceived instalments of their ultimate aim.

Over two decades, the majority of right hon. and hon. Members have had reservations, but understandably they have felt that perhaps experiments should be put to the test. We now know the result, and the rescue brigade should not come to the aid of terrorists by insulting our intelligence with suggestions that contacts should be maintained and doors should be kept open to enable Mr. Adams and his friends to regain credibility for an utterly dishonest campaign which is as transparent as that waged by Hitler in 1939 and 1940, when he trampled all over eastern Europe and, at the same time, proclaimed himself a man of peace. I suggest that no public figure will want to forfeit respect by allowing himself to be conned yet again.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be wrong to follow the line of those in the media who misunderstood TUAS to mean a tactical use of the armed struggle instead of the total use of the armed struggle, which Hitler adopted and which Gerry Adams adopts?

Sir James Molyneaux: My hon. Friend knows the news industry well enough by now to know that, dedicated as it is to the ever-lasting search for soundbites as opposed to substance, it is not surprising that the news organisations fed off each other, brainwashed each other and came to a shallow conclusion without a shred of evidence. I hope that my hon. Friend will not feel that that is too harsh a stricture on the news industry, but I feel that it has a lot to answer for.

Another ceasefire or promise to disarm might spark some interest in the minds of some and might possibly provide material for chat shows, but would not be relevant now. The only real issue is the principle of consent, as the hon. Member for Redcar has said. It is not in the nature of terrorists anywhere to accept the democratic principle of consent. The rest of mankind takes it for granted, but consent exists in the terrorist vocabulary only for the purpose of calculating how a democratic people can be terrorised into consenting. For them, democracy will always have a low priority. The bomb and the gun have to be retained, not as a fall-back position, but as the driving force and the engine to extract concessions that will lead to surrender to ultimate terrorist demands.

Against that sober background, I appeal to the current Irish Government and any future Irish Government not to continue reiterating demands for concessions to republican requirements. That justification has disappeared now that the destruction of democracy is the asking price for a cessation of violence. No Irish Government should contemplate paying that price, even by instalments. Nor should a Dublin Government try to pressurise any British Government to consider such folly. The democratic structures of the United Kingdom must not be mutilated when it has been proved that such a course would achieve precisely nothing in return.

The main purpose of the recent election—the forum and the so-called peace talks—has been obliterated. The Secretary of State's curious requirement—as it is not original, I am not blaming the right hon. and learned Gentleman for inventing it—that there should be all-party support for any structure or option effectively rules out the possibility of devolved government in the foreseeable future. That being so, I shall stop beating my head against that brick wall.

Why does the Secretary imagine, or in what circumstances does he imagine, that the House would require all-party backing for arrangements for Scotland, for example, as my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South has said? Why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman imagine that in the current talks he is likely to achieve results, when he knows, as I know, that, despite our determined efforts when he chaired the strand 1 talks in 1992, we were unable—two Governments and four parties were involved—to achieve agreement? Why is it thought possible now, with two and a half Governments involved—the half being the Government across the Atlantic—and nine or 10 parties, that they will be any more successful in achieving results?

It is to be hoped that the Government, given that the purpose of the election—the forum and the talks—has been obliterated in its main purpose, or main published and alleged purpose, would consider it possible to come to the House for consultation on possible future roles for the structures so recently established.

Soon, I know, we shall have predictable bleatings about the imaginary vacuum, which would probably be not all that much greater than in Scotland and Wales or the regions of England; but I have a duty to counter any anxiety about a possible vacuum, and in doing so I enlist the aid of the business managers and other parties in both Houses of Parliament.

With Northern Ireland ministerial co-operation, we can make fuller use, for example, of Wednesday morning sittings. We must press on with the aim of expanding the role of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee with provisions for sittings in Northern Ireland, in line with its Scottish counterpart. We can encourage Northern Ireland Members, in addition to those who are nominated, to attend legislative Committees of the House and to participate in debates.

In Northern Ireland, we can make more effective the scrutiny of proposed legislation by providing councillors with specialist knowledge with opportunities to discuss all important legislation with Ministers or heads of Departments at post-consultative stage.

As you will remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a week ago we touched on ideas for an economic committee based on both Houses of Parliament to buttress the excellent work of the Under-Secretary of State, Baroness Denton, along with that of her Department and the Industrial Development Board. There may have been the usual objections from the vaults of the Northern Ireland Office, but the grounds for such rearguard action have now been conclusively removed. We must start making progress in streamlining the system of governing the United Kingdom, including the Northern Ireland component, which my colleagues and I represent.

The resumption of violence will become a deterrent to investors, and that must be countered. The creation of a new all-party committee, based on both Houses, will do much to give confidence to overseas investors, and I hope will be of great assistance and support to the Secretary of State and his colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office.

As the debate is focused on constitutional matters and not on security, I shall refrain from tendering in public my suggestions on security. It is, as the Secretary of State said this evening, for the Government to decide what new measures are required to defend the Queen's subjects wherever domiciled from terrorism from whatever quarter.

I trust that we have not entirely forgotten or dismissed the suggestion made by the Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), for a supremo without ministerial burdens to co-ordinate a counter-insurgency strategy within the United Kingdom and Crown territories. We should not underestimate the benefits to the IRA of its tactical lull in terms of training, targeting and re-equipping over the past two years of the so-called ceasefire.

I believe that there is an urgent need for the Government to consult other European Governments to discover how those Governments completely eliminated the scourge of terrorism from their territories. I do not doubt the capacity of the security forces and the police throughout the United Kingdom to meet the challenge, but the morale of the general public in Northern Ireland in the main and—I say this from experience of moving about this island—that of the general public here is in urgent need of repair. The public need to be convinced that the 20-year retreat is over and that the Government are convinced that any perceived concessions will merely prolong the agony and encourage murderers to do even more.

In conclusion, and in short, the Government must let it be seen that they now intend to take sides and support the 85 per cent. of people who flatly refused to vote for Sinn Fein-IRA on 30 May.

8.7 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): It is a privilege to take up the remarks of the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux). Not for the first time, and I am sure not for the last, I find that I substantially agree with the greater part of his speech. I detect, however, one area of disagreement, with which I shall deal later. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not take exception to what I shall say.

As for the substantial business of the evening, the issue is somewhat academic. There is no alternative. Indeed, there are no options. The Northern Ireland Act 1974 must be renewed. When we debate the other hardy annuals, the emergency provisions and prevention of terrorism legislation, hon. Members sometimes make the point that they wish different circumstances would prevail and that the day would come when renewal would no longer be necessary. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said in his opening remarks, the same argument applies to the measure that is before us.

We look forward to the day when there need no longer be direct rule in Northern Ireland. We look forward, of course, to the time when the democratic deficit can be addressed positively by the establishment of acceptable forms of government in the Province. Whatever our analysis of the present situation in Northern Ireland, and whatever our personal future agendas on Northern Ireland, we can agree that, for the time being, there is no alternative but to renew the 1974 Act.

As for the present situation, from one point of view, as the saying goes, it is a case of "I think we'll have to think it out again"; it is time to go back to the drawing board. The bomb last Saturday certainly brought destruction to Manchester. It also blew apart many of the illusions that had dogged the so-called "peace" process for many months.

As I see things, we are, in a manner of speaking, back at base. In effect, we are starting out again. In that context, I shall make just three brief observations. I shall state them simply and then expand them. First, in prevailing or foreseeable circumstances, the Provisionals' participation in the process has come to an end. Secondly, the talks should continue without the Provisionals. Thirdly, we should revise our priorities; security issues should now share equal prominence with the search for political agreement between the constitutional parties.

First—regarding the Provisionals' participation in the process—it is, I contend, self-evident that the Manchester bomb has underlined and reinforced Sinn Fein-IRA's self-exclusion from the process. Both in prevailing and in foreseeable circumstances it seems that that self-exclusion is now absolute. The leader writer in The Independent on Monday made the point when he wrote:

"The whole point of this process as originally envisaged was that it included Sinn Fein and the IRA. It is very hard to see how they can be brought back for a long time."

The leader writer in The Guardian on the same day made precisely the same point:

"There is no evidence that they"—

Sinn Fein—

"can deliver peace, and plenty of evidence that they intend to continue with war. Unless and until that changes, there is no point in talking to them in the current process."

After the Manchester bomb and after the shooting of the Garda officers in the Republic, there should be no illusions. There is no place in a civilised society for Sinn Fein-IRA, let alone in negotiations seeking to create in Northern Ireland new relations based exclusively on non-violence and democracy. It beggars belief. In Northern Ireland, they have threatened, intimidated, tortured and murdered. In England, they bomb shoppers on a Saturday morning. In the Republic of Ireland they shoot policemen. At the same time, they have the audacity to claim that they want peace and to take the gun out of Irish politics. There is no place for such people in negotiations, and there never can be while that mind set prevails.

Mr. Adams says that he will not be deflected from the search for peace. Of course, if he is serious, he can begin immediately. He can unequivocally and unreservedly condemn those who planted the bomb in Manchester and those who murdered Garda Officer McCabe. He can publicly renounce, denounce and repudiate the IRA, but he will not do that. Unless he does, talk of "unauthorised" IRA operations and divisions within the Republican movement count for nothing, and Sinn Fein-IRA's self-exclusion will remain absolute.

Moreover, the renewing of a so-called "ceasefire" at some point in the future as the key to entry into negotiations is surely now woefully inadequate. The first point is that the Provisionals are out; we can regard their self-exclusion as absolute. The second point is that the talks must go on. Faced with the Provisionals' self-exclusion, there is a choice for the two Governments and the other parties: either to call it a day, pack their bags and go home, or to continue without Sinn Fein.

I strongly reject the argument that talks without Sinn Fein are not worth the candle. I welcome the Government's decision to press on, and I understand that that is the decision of the other parties as well. First, the primacy of importance that some commentators and politicians have hitherto given to Sinn Fein's participation has been misplaced. It is highly questionable that an agreement involving Sinn Fein was ever achievable. It is even more questionable now.

I do not believe that the Provisionals have ever been interested in compromise, and they are not interested now. They are not prepared to accept anything short of what can be sold to their supporters as a transitional package leading clearly and inevitably to a united Ireland; an irreversible step on the road to that united Ireland, regardless of the wishes of the majority of the people of Northern Ireland. It is self-evident that such a transitional package would be unacceptable to all Unionists, both on the mainland and in Northern Ireland—and rightly so.

Secondly, talks without Sinn Fein are effectively a revival of the three-strand talks, the so-called Brooke initiative of 1991—I refer to my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke)—which my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State resumed in 1992. On this, I have a slight difference of understanding from the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley, as I do not believe that the exercises were fruitless. He made a point about the breakdown on strand 1 issues. My understanding is that agreement was well and truly in sight but the Social Democratic and Labour party—I regret that no member of it is here to correct or answer me on this point—changed its position, to the surprise of others, at the last moment. I believe that it was possible during those talks—I believe that it is possible now—dimly to discern potentially promising areas of common ground and common thinking between Unionists and nationalists. I believe that it is worth exploring that ground again.

Sir James Molyneaux: I can set the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest. I was not implying that the talks were a complete failure, because, as he said, much ground work was done. The phrase used at the time, as the Secretary of State will remember, was that they were "banked". They are still there. The only difference between the hon. Gentleman and me is that I was far too delicate to apportion the blame to my neighbours from the SDLP, who are not here at the moment.

Mr. Hunter: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that clarification.

I was listing the reasons that I believe that negotiations, talks, without Sinn Fein should be pursued, and the last reason I have for holding that position is my belief that an agreement reached by the representatives of 85 per cent. of the people of Northern Ireland is better than no agreement at all. The resolution of Northern Ireland's "democratic deficit" is highly desirable. Moreover, an agreement by the 85 per cent. on the form of Government within the Province and on the structures for communication and co-operation with the Republic would further isolate the men of violence. I argue that it is not unreasonable to hope that Unionists and constitutional nationalists can find substantial areas for agreement through negotiations. My second point, then, is that negotiations should proceed with Sinn Fein.

My third and final point is this. I believe that we should revise our priorities in an important respect. That is not a thought that I have previously shared with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, but I do not think that he will consider it heretical, because he alluded to much of what I believe in his opening remarks.

The reality is that the IRA is at war with the British and Irish people. Since 9 February, IRA active service units have planted no fewer than seven bombs on the mainland, and more can be expected. They have murdered two people, and they could have murdered many more. They have injured more than 300 people—I fear, scarring and psychologically traumatising some for life. The cost of repairing the damage by those bombs is in the region of half a billion pounds, and this campaign has not been as intensive as some in the past.

The IRA safely stores the greater part of its arsenal of weapons and explosives in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Will the hon. Gentleman explain what he means when he says that the IRA "safely stores" its arms in the Republic?

Mr. Hunter: We have reason to believe that the overwhelming majority of those arms remain undetected. Therefore, by definition, they are safely stored. The Garda have made a number of discoveries, and have caught IRA personnel in transit moving a minute proportion of the arms and explosives; but the greater part are safely stored, undetected.

There, in the Republic of Ireland, the IRA maintains various echelons of its command, or parts of them; it recruits and trains volunteers, as it does in Northern Ireland. Through robbery and other means, the IRA is raising funds in the Republic. It uses Irish ports to transport men and materials to this country. Most recently, it has murdered one Irish police officer and wounded a second. That state of affairs cannot be tolerated in either country, and it must not be tolerated. It calls for thought and action.

I stress that I do not advocate the proverbial emotive, knee-jerk response to terrorist activity or terrorist violence. That could be unwise, and could prove counter-productive. I do, however, advocate a fundamental review of security, which should receive as much detailed attention as is given to the search for political agreement between the constitutional parties. The review should be conducted jointly by the two Governments, because security measures are most effective if they are undertaken in that way. In the light of the common threat to the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland posed by the IRA, ideally we and the Irish Government would have a common security policy and a common security programme.

The right tone and tenor of such a security review would be assured if the two Prime Ministers led, as they have on political matters. In short, I believe that there is a case for a security summit, from which a common security policy and a common security programme could flow.

I certainly do not claim to be an expert on these matters, but I am aware of some areas in which, in the past, the Army, the Royal Ulster Constabulary and others have felt that improvements could be made. By that, I mean the conditions governing hot pursuit across the border from both sides; special operations within the Republic; cross-border communication between the respective police forces and armies at a tactical level; our use of Irish air space; and the gathering and exchange of intelligence, which is the ultimate weapon in the battle against terrorism. No doubt there are other areas of concern. I believe that they should be addressed as a matter of urgency. A fundamental review of our security could also consider that range of other measures that have been deployed against the IRA from time to time, such as the broadcasting ban, internment and a strategy for border crossing points.

The essential point, however, is that sovereign Governments must assure themselves, and must be able to assure their citizens, that everything possible is being done, first to protect people and property, and secondly to enforce the rule of law. In the prevailing circumstances, it must be restated that security is our equal highest priority—hence the argument for a security summit to achieve maximum co-operation and joint action with the Irish Government.

Let me summarise my argument. The situation has changed, but it should not cause total despair. We now know where we stand. In prevailing and foreseeable circumstances, the Provisionals' self-exclusion from the process is absolute. The talks must go on, and hopefully an agreement can be reached. An agreement reached by the representatives of 85 per cent. of the people of Northern Ireland is better than no agreement. We must revise our priorities, and refocus attention on security issues. In the context of an agreement between the constitutional parties, joint security measures could probably be implemented more effectively. Meanwhile, we must live with the Northern Ireland Act 1974 for a little longer.

8.26 pm

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): I speak as a Labour member of the Northern Ireland Select Committee.

The nature of what we are discussing, and the inevitability of it, have already been mentioned, but I feel that particularly in the aftermath of the Manchester bombing and the murder of Garda McCabe, it would be useful for a Labour Back Bencher to describe the fury that is felt about those events. We have never supported, sympathised with or even hinted that we see any justification for violence. These latest terrorist atrocities are just the latest in a long line, but the timing is especially unfortunate. Everyone had hoped that we were heading towards a constitutional settlement in Northern Ireland at last, and hon. Members are particularly angry for that reason.

Direct rule is not the answer, as all hon. Members know, but it will be inevitable for as long as the present situation continues. The IRA maintains that it is fighting for a united Ireland and that it holds out the hand of friendship to Northern Ireland's Unionist population, but, as has been pointed out, what it did in Manchester poses a particular threat to investment. The IRA's threats of violence endanger the future economic development of Northern Ireland.

How can the IRA pose as the arbiter of an all-Ireland arrangement when it is damaging the very country that it professes to wish to unite? Let me put it in a more human way. Each person that the IRA kills or maims in Northern Ireland creates a group of people who are then not prepared—understandably—to listen to overtures of so-called peace from it. The IRA has created pools of bitterness by attacking and murdering people in Northern Ireland: that is its legacy. It aims to create a united Ireland, yet its actions are creating deeper divisions and are turning people against its cause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) and my right hon. Friend the leader of the Labour party have the complete support of Labour Back Benchers when they say that the threats, intimidation and violence of the IRA will make no difference to how we conduct ourselves, not only in opposition but, I hope, in a year's time when we are in government. That is the message of not only Labour Front Benchers but Labour Back Benchers.

[Mr. Thomas McAvoy]

The loyalist paramilitaries are setting an example of maturity and discipline. Men of past violence are now committed to the democratic process and have signed up to the Mitchell commission's six principles.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux), in yet another thoughtful speech, mentioned the principle of consent. The majority in Northern Ireland do not favour leaving the United Kingdom. I must say to the right hon. Gentleman and to my other friends on the Unionist Benches that, too often when they make speeches about consent, they leave out another aspect of the matter: that, if we are to have a system in Northern Ireland that has the broad consent of the majority of the people, the Unionist community must have the broad consent of the nationalist community to institutions and organisations in Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar recognised that point in her speech.

The Unionist community has the strength of being in the majority, but I should like to see it take the high-profile position of being seen to offer the nationalist community consent and consensus, not just by rhetoric but by its actions. The Ulster Unionist party, the majority party representing the Unionist community, should be more open in extending the hand of friendship and negotiation to the nationalist community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar made a point that I have made repeatedly in the past: the flashpoint of parades must be addressed. We broadly support the Government's stance, but I regret the fact that efforts have not been made to establish community consent for parades. The two communities in Northern Ireland recognise the desirability of parades, but it would help if there was a mechanism that allowed the communities to agree. I do not see the point of any organisation parading through an area where it knows that it is not welcome. The Secretary of State should establish some mechanism to secure consent in the communities for parades.

The position in Scotland has been mentioned, but it is different. Although there are differences of opinion on devolution or a Scottish assembly, there is no organised violence, and each side recognises that there are political differences. I agree with the principle of devolution.

I congratulate the Secretary of State and the Government on the co-operation and understanding that they have reached with the Irish Government. As my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar said, we make progress in the Northern Ireland-Ireland peace process when the British and Irish Governments take the same course, taking all political parties with them.

I have been mildly critical of the Ulster Unionist party, but I congratulate it on its professional and constructive attitude to the forum and the talks. Its example of being prepared not to surrender a point but to negotiate is a good one. It has reflected well the aspirations of the community it represents.

Another problem is the so-called punishment beatings, of which some loyalists are as guilty as the IRA. Who do these people think they are that they can be police, judge and executioner? They must be stopped.

The IRA's action in Manchester was a betrayal of the mandate it received in last month's elections. It sought a mandate on the basis of its participation in the peace process. As soon as it got that mandate, it betrayed it and returned to violence.

I do not agree that the IRA is a monolithic organisation with no nuances within it. There are differences of opinion; it is not quite as straightforward or simple as some folk say.

The House should send the message that violence and intimidation will not work, and will make no difference to the negotiations. If the IRA is genuinely seeking to represent its people—albeit only 15 per cent. of the population—it must declare a ceasefire and return to the peace process.

Everybody must know that the atmosphere in Northern Ireland during the ceasefire was first-class. People relaxed and felt that they could live a little without the fear of being killed. If the IRA wants a united Ireland, in the sense not of uniting bits of land but of two communities opposing violence and talking to each other, it should abandon violence, sign the six Mitchell principles and recognise that there is no future in its continued violence.

8.38 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said that the original legislation that gives rise to tonight's order imposed temporary direct rule on Northern Ireland while a new way forward was sorted out. More than 20 years later, we are marking the passing of yet another 12 months and being asked to approve a further extension. It is not putting too fine a point on the matter to say that that is extremely depressing.

Some of us, sadly, also find it extremely predictable. I have a sense that things are worse rather than better. If we are ever to break that apparently never-ending sequence, we must take stock of the peace process. I share the belief of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) that things are fundamentally different since the Manchester bombing.

Where are we one year on, as we renew yet again this inevitable order? Direct rule is still with us, and I see no sign of it going away before we observe this ritual again next year. Local government in Northern Ireland is still virtually powerless, despite all-party co-operation being a daily fact of life in the council chambers of Northern Ireland.

If my right hon. and learned Friend cannot make progress with constitutional matters, he may find it worth while to examine local government powers as a one-off way of showing that democratic and peaceful co-operation between parties that believe in working with each other can deliver results. Progress in that direction need not be so controversial that it would bring the house down around us.

One year on, the peace process is still alive, but probably only just. In a strange way, that process may have been given a chance by the Canary Wharf and Manchester bombings rather than totally ruined, for one particular reason. Those two bombings, particularly Manchester, finally brought all democrats to their senses. Those two atrocities proved to me beyond doubt that one-sided concessions do not lead to permanent peace, and will never lead to justice. The bombings showed also that appeasing evil is not only degrading but achieves nothing.

We must compare the achievements of the British and Dublin Governments and Sinn Fein-IRA. That is an uncomfortable task, but essential if we are to understand our position and make progress. I regret having to say that the British Government's achievements over the past 12 months make the most dismal reading—although I do not blame them. The most noticeable features that come to mind are £100 million of damage and a death at Canary Wharf and at least £100 million of damage in Manchester.

The Dublin Government have made significant progress of the sort that is deeply damaging to UK interests. During the past year, Dublin has established an effective veto over what is left of the peace process, as shown in the discussions leading to the all-party talks, and in the wrangling over Senator Mitchell. Now, the UK must obtain the agreement of a foreign Government before we can make any progress with our peace process, which appals me.

Regrettably, the achievements of Sinn Fein-IRA over the past year have been huge and—in their eyes at least—impressive, but in my eyes they are a total affront to the people of Northern Ireland. Over the past 12 months, Sinn Fein-IRA have bombed a date for talks out of the British and Dublin Governments. They have retained every one of their guns and every ounce of their explosives—apart from those used for tactical reasons. Sinn Fein-IRA have managed to drag an American president into a UK domestic matter, which has always been their aim. They have managed by their pressure and menace to foist on the people of the UK a foreigner as the chairman of all-party talks.

That is not all—not by any stretch of the imagination is that half of it. The worst thing is that, during the past year, and the year before, Sinn Fein-IRA have been able to re-equip, train, recruit and target the innocent virtually unhindered. When we started the peace process two years ago, Sinn Fein-IRA were demoralised, well and truly infiltrated, and effectively contained by the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the British Army. As I read it, at that time they were suing for peace. Two years later, Sinn Fein-IRA are revitalised and have reorganised. I say clearly and simply that we should be ashamed of ourselves for having allowed that to happen.

We must first admit, if we are to make progress, that we have been conned by Sinn Fein-IRA. Somehow—for reasons that commentators have tried to explain—we managed to persuade ourselves that Sinn Fein-IRA were willing to accept democracy and to fool ourselves that they had halted their violence and called a ceasefire. I totally agree with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke in his brave and deeply impressive speech.

Where is the evidence that Sinn Fein-IRA have become democratic? Only yesterday, Adams refused to say whether he is pressing his co-terrorists for a ceasefire. Only yesterday, Adams refused to repudiate an armed struggle. Only yesterday, Adams refused yet again to condemn the murder of a policeman in the Republic or the Manchester bombing.

It is crystal clear that Sinn Fein-IRA hold democracy in contempt. They always have. They have continued to do so during the peace process, and they always will. Where is the evidence that Sinn Fein-IRA have ever halted their violence or called a real ceasefire? The grisly list of mutilations and murders has continued growing day by day throughout the past year. The Canary Wharf and Manchester bombings confirm that the so-called ceasefire was nothing but a cynical and tactical ploy. The British and Dublin Governments, never Sinn Fein-IRA, said that the ceasefire was permanent. We kidded ourselves into believing that, because we wanted to believe it.

Now that we know the Sinn Fein-IRA definition of a ceasefire, I sincerely hope that we finally understand that, if Sinn Fein-IRA were to reinstate their so-called "ceasefire", it would be nothing short of a sick joke. I sincerely hope that no one will ever again fall for that ploy. We must realise that another cynical declaration is far removed from what must happen if Sinn Fein-IRA are ever to be allowed to sit down with genuine democrats.

The second thing we must do when deciding where we go from here—in addition to being conned in the past year, and vowing that we will not let it happen again—is to realise that we are still trying to do the same thing. We are still trying to kid ourselves, to make ourselves feel a little more cheerful. I still hear people saying that they want to believe, and that they do believe, that Sinn Fein-IRA are made up of different organisations.

A few moments ago, I heard the hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy) suggest that Sinn Fein-IRA are perhaps not as organised as they might be. I still hear people wishfully thinking that there is a split in the IRA. But those are very dangerous fallacies.

Mr. McAvoy: For the record, I did not say that the IRA was not organised; I said that it was not monolithic. There is a difference.

Mr. Wilshire: I accept that. I was trying very hard not to suggest that the hon. Gentleman was necessarily caught up in some of my criticisms, but he gave me an opportunity to say that there are people who think in that way. I entirely accept his correction.

If anyone still doubts that Sinn Fein-IRA are other than one and the same, I invite them to consider the list of Sinn Fein-IRA representatives on the forum. Let us consider just three of them.

Sinn Fein is represented on the forum by a Mr. Gerry Adams. He is none other than the man who was a member of the IRA delegation that met Viscount Whitelaw. Mr. Adams—the Sinn Fein member of the forum—is none other than the Mr. Adams who has twice been interned for membership of the IRA.

Then there is his crony, Mr. McGuinness, who is another member of the forum representing Sinn Fein. We would do well to remember that Martin McGuinness was imprisoned in the Republic for membership of the IRA, and that, at his trial, he very proudly told the court that he was indeed proud to be the commander of the IRA's Londonderry battalion.

The third person on the list is Mr. Kelly. A Sinn Fein representative on the forum, he is none other than the Mr. Kelly who has served two life sentences for IRA bombings. Mr. Kelly was involved in the bomb attacks on the Old Bailey and on Scotland yard, and played his part in killing one person and injuring 250 others.

Those are the representatives of the so-called "different organisation"—Sinn Fein. Those three people were and remain members of Sinn Fein-IRA; the facts, the evidence and the their actions prove it. I hope that no one remains in any doubt about the reality of that organisation.

Sinn Fein-IRA will continue to portray themselves as two different organisations, and one has to accept that that is a very clever tactic. During the past year that tactic has paid enormous dividends. As Sinn Fein, these killers have managed to obtain dozens of one-sided concessions from the peace process. Then, acting as real killers, these people—in the guise of the IRA—have obtained dozens more concessions by the tactical use of the bomb and the bullet. It is a clever tactic. It is a deliberate tactic. If we allow ourselves to be fooled, it will continue to work.

Where is the evidence for a split in the IRA? If anyone believes that there is a split, in my judgment, they base their belief on Sinn Fein-IRA propaganda, some of which we have recently heard. The callous murder of a policeman in Adare was by an IRA "rogue element", said the IRA. That is palpable nonsense. If the IRA murderers of that policeman were a rogue element, the police in the Republic would have found their corpses by now. They have not found any corpses because the murder was planned and executed properly, thoroughly and deliberately by the IRA. There is no split.

There are those who say that the Manchester bomb proved a split. The Manchester bomb was a tonne and a half of home-made explosives. It was not an impromptu expression of frustration by a few deranged people, and it was not done by breakaway people who are out of control. The Manchester bomb was carefully planned and part of a positive, deliberate and calculated policy. That policy has but a single objective: a united Ireland, on Sinn Fein-IRA's terms at any price.

The truth of Manchester is quite simply that, while Adams was posing for his propaganda photographs outside the gates of Stormont, his friends were busy putting a tonne and a half of fertiliser through a food mixer. That is not done in a few days; it takes a long time. While Adams was posing for his photographs, he knew that they had already planned to bomb on a Saturday morning in Manchester. It was callous, it was deliberate, and it proves that there is no split.

The third thing we must do when we decide where we go from here is to stop pandering to these evil people. The time really has come to call a halt to our dealings with Sinn Fein-IRA. That goes for the Dublin Government as well as for us. I must tell the Dublin Government that their rhetoric since the shooting of the policeman and the Manchester bomb has been fine. I applaud their rhetoric, but their decision to keep in touch with Sinn Fein-IRA is an affront to the bereaved and to the injured. I hope that the House deplores that decision.

The only message that Dublin should send to Sinn Fein-IRA, and the only message that we should send, is quite simple. It is: "No more talks; no more meetings; no more leaving doors open; no more keeping in touch, unless and until you in Sinn Fein-IRA renounce violence for ever, unless and until you show some remorse for your hideous crimes and unless and until you surrender—I say 'surrender' not 'decommission'; let us not mince our words—unless or until you surrender all your arms and explosives you, Sinn Fein-IRA, are outcasts, and the only contact you will now have with either of the two Governments, with any of us as politicians, or with the huge majority of decent ordinary people in Northern Ireland, is with our police and our armies as they track you down."

I agree wholeheartedly with the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke. A crackdown is necessary. One can deal with evil only by confronting it.

Clearly my main argument is that we need to come to our senses with regard to Sinn Fein-IRA, and to exclude it. But that in itself is not enough. I know that some of my colleagues would go even so far as to say that members of Sinn Fein-IRA should be instantly locked up, but I would not support that. Even if I did, that in itself would not be enough, either.

As well as coming to our senses and cracking down on Sinn Fein-IRA, we must have a positive policy for the future. We must make it clear that we know where we are going. That is why I support all the calls from both sides of the House and from all the other people who say that the peace process must continue. We must press ahead with talks between all genuine democrats, and with good will we must thrash out an agreement to which the Unionist parties and the SDLP can both sign up.

While we do that, we must take care to avoid three dangers. While making that progress, we must understand that the framework documents are non-starters. They are wholly unacceptable to the majority in Northern Ireland, because they represent a green agenda; they will not be entertained.

Secondly, those who participate in the talks over the coming year must understand that, in Northern Ireland, there remains and will remain a big majority who want to remain within the United Kingdom, so a united Ireland must not be on the agenda.

The third thing that must be understood both by the British Government and by the Dublin Government is that, at the end of the talks process, no solution can ever be imposed either by IRA violence or by Government coercion. There is no way in which a solution can be imposed without the wholehearted consent of the people of Northern Ireland.

I accept that securing that agreement will not be easy or quick. In my judgment, it will not be helped by Senator Mitchell or other foreigners interfering in our internal affairs. I fear that it may be accompanied by more violence. To those who may be tempted to suggest that what I say might all too often encourage violence, I reply that whatever way forward is chosen—be it the way that I advocate or the way that anybody else advocates—if it is a way that does not give in to terrorism, it will surely produce more violence. That we must accept and confront—but we must and can reach an agreement.

When we do, we must put that agreement to the people of Northern Ireland in a referendum. I believe that, if the Unionist parties and the SDLP back such an agreement, it is sure to secure a huge majority in a referendum. When we have that, we can legislate to end tonight's annual ritual.

If, when we have done all that, Sinn Fein-IRA continue with their violence, Dublin as well as the British Government will have a justification for interning their members, and that is what will have to happen. Having gone through the process of agreement, referendum and legislation, we shall be able to demand and expect that world opinion support us.

I believe that the people of Northern Ireland deserve better than never-ending direct rule. They deserve to feel confident that we have ended our attempts to appease terrorists and to do deals with the devil. Above all else, they deserve to know that we in the House have a clear policy for giving them what they want above all else, which in my view is peace, justice and prosperity—three things that they have waited an enormous length of time to enjoy.

9.3 pm

Rev. William McCrea (Mid–Ulster): I am delighted to be able to follow the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire). Many of the things that have been brought to our attention tonight are worthy of our most earnest consideration.

I entered the House in 1983, and since then, we have undergone the annual ritual, as we are once again this evening, of debating the interim period extension of the Northern Ireland Act 1974. Since 1973, I have served in local government in Northern Ireland, and I am still a member of a local district council. Unfortunately, we realise that the powers of such councils are practically nil. Consultation in reality means very little. The word "consultation" should never be included in any agreement if anyone wants it to mean something, as we have seen from the reality of consultative processes in Northern Ireland over the past 24 years.

Since entering the House in 1983, I have had the privilege of representing the constituency of Mid-Ulster, which has endured much due to terrorism. In recent days I have been delighted at the good news of the creation of 300 new jobs in Cookstown. I therefore express once again my appreciation to Baroness Denton, who has responsibility in the other place for economic development in the Province. She has put herself out there at the front in trying to gain employment for the people of the Province and I respect her for so doing.

Unfortunately, yesterday evening, after the good news of the 300 jobs in Cookstown, the town was closed off due to the threat of terrorism. That is the tragic reality. The people of my constituency have been held to ransom for many years because of terrorist thugs who have no intention of being part of society—except they rule it. They have no intention of entering the democratic process. Those who represent IRA-Sinn Fein on district councils insult democracy. One of them sat in the chair of the council on which I have served for 23 years and of which I was chairman last year, yet, up to this moment, never once has he condemned one act of terrorist violence by the IRA. Never once did he condemn the blowing up of our main street and economic centre in our town and district. Yet he has the cheek and the brass neck to take the post of chairman and try to project an image. What is the image of? It is an image of carnage, destruction, murder and vile atrocity. That is not what I believe that our district or our Province have a right to expect.

We are gathered here under the shadow of the gun and the bomb. We must face the reality of a police officer in the Irish Republic paying the ultimate sacrifice simply for being a member of that state's police force. I have no doubt that he played his part in seeking to bring peace to his community with diligence and excellence. I certainly join those who have sympathised with his wife and family circle.

Once again the people of Manchester on the mainland have endured the vile atrocity of a bomb. While it is true that one can put back together the buildings, having come through such an experience with my family and in my home, I know that it will take longer to put back together the pieces of the people who have endured such a tragedy. On behalf of my constituents and the good people of Northern Ireland, I wish the people of Manchester godspeed in their recovery, and trust that not only the scars on their bodies will heal but the scars that are much deeper.

No one in the House can understand the devastation, heartache and heartbreak unless they have experienced the hurt and the pangs of suffering of those who have gone through the nightmare of terrorist violence. I thank God that most hon. Members have not known that experience, and I trust that they never will. The heartache being endured by those families is not diminished when they see representatives of murderers walking in the corridors of power across the world, accepted as if they were democrats.

I condemn and express my contempt for those who have carried out these dastardly deeds in the Irish Republic and, in recent days, in Manchester, but I wish also to commend the professionalism of the police. I trust that they know that their professionalism is deeply appreciated throughout the United Kingdom.

We must ask why the terrorists do this. It is difficult for anyone to enter the twisted mind of a terrorist or a terrorist organisation, but I do not believe that this could be called mindless terrorism. I do not believe that there is such a thing as mindless terrorism. There is a purpose behind their activity. There is an aim and an objective. We must ask what sort of objective there could be in the mind of anyone in a sane society for carrying out such dastardly, devilish and heinous deeds, whether at Canary Wharf or in Manchester?

I think that the Provisional IRA believes that it can shift the resolve of Governments to rule justly. I think that it believes that because it was a former Prime Minister who said of the Anglo-Irish agreement, that she signed it because she "could not allow the violence to continue."

Therefore, without the violence, there would have been no Anglo-Irish agreement.

Following that agreement we had the Downing street declaration and then the framework document. If ever any document gave cheer to the enemies of Ulster and the United Kingdom it was the framework document. They believed that they were progressing in a certain direction and that Governments listened to the bomb and the bullet. No matter how one tries to dress it up, it was a green and Republican document. It is resented by the vast majority of law-abiding and decent people in Northern Ireland. Anyone who does not believe that should ask the people and allow them to give their answer.

After 25 years of carnage, murder and destruction, what will the IRA have to do before it is dealt with effectively or told that there is no place in a civilised and democratic society for the bomb and the bullet? The IRA has received concession after concession. Despite that, the South Londonderry brigade of the IRA—it calls itself the South Derry brigade—made a statement at the weekend. It said:

"The British Government have failed to deliver and have palmed us off for 20 months with schoolboy concessions."

I can assure the House that those who have watched those concessions being delivered to the provisionals on a silver plate do not believe that they were schoolboy concessions.

[Rev. William McCrea]

In fact, many in the republican movement jibed at the Unionist elected representatives and said—I quote one of them:

"When will your English overlords know that you can't buy us off?"

What was termed a peace process, and the announcement, and the glitter and media attention of a ceasefire, was nothing but a cynical farce—but of course it achieved much for Adams. It got him into the United States. Senator Mitchell was one of those who signed the document to get him there. It even got him into the White House. He sat down with the leader of the western world, and there was Adams—a terrorist, a representative of murderers—sitting, dining with Presidents.

Those who have dined with Adams and McGuinness should be ashamed of themselves, because, instead of their gaining peace, Adams gained a certain respectability and was taken in, walking the corridors of power, paraded across the world—and all the time it was a farce.

There were those who realised it—realised that the leopard had not changed its spots. Gerry Adams would never have been known of, if not for the power of the bombs and the bullets of the IRA. Who would have listened to Gerry Adams? What would he have been? It was not his authority in speech or his oratory in delivery; it was the power of the weaponry of terrorism. Because of it, Adams was received. Although he was carrying out a totally dishonest campaign, Adams and McGuinness and the republican hierarchy led democratic Governments a merry dance.

They are still doing it. Mr. Clinton is keeping his contacts open. The Prime Minister of the Irish Republic is keeping his contacts open. They must be maintained. That is an insult to democracy.

We are currently witnessing, on one hand, the pressure exerted by the terrorists, and, on the other, Adams working and using the media to project an image as though he were the dove. Some Members of the House may be gulled, and why not? Were they not conned when they walked him into this, the Palace of Westminster, stood on platforms with him and presented him as though he were some democrat who had fallen out of heaven, while he represented a cold-blooded murder machine that murdered many of my constituents?

Although we may con ourselves, the provisional IRA are recruiting, restocking and retraining at this moment. Yet we were told, "All it will take will be a ceasefire; the doors of Stormont buildings will magically open, and in, sweeping through the gates with his republican entourage, will be the acceptable Gerry Adams."

I say on behalf of my party that Gerry Adams was unacceptable last year, he was unacceptable last week, before the bomb, and he still is unacceptable after the bomb. Gerry Adams has not changed; Martin McGuinness has not changed, either. In a previous but similar debate, I mentioned the names of those who comprise the army council of the IRA. I should like to know what action has been taken against them. Since that debate, several television programmes have openly named them, too, and described the positions of authority on the army council that they hold. Are these people—whether in the Irish Republic or the United Kingdom—above the law? Are they beyond the law? Why cannot they be lifted and brought to justice? Many of them have carried out the most heinous crimes imaginable.

Now the talks have begun, and I have been elected both as a negotiator and as a member of the forum. Many people in Northern Ireland do not understand why representatives of a foreign Government parade up the steps to those buildings day by day. The elected representatives of the Province have in the past had much in common. During the previous set of talks a sub-committee was set up, comprising the SDLP, the Ulster Unionists, the Democratic Unionists and the Alliance party. It was charged with looking into a way of administering the Province by means of devolved government, to deal effectively, justly and fairly with the day-to-day affairs affecting all the people of Northern Ireland.

The papers describing those meetings have not yet been released, but I can tell the House that the parties reached an agreement—or nearly did. Many have applauded the leader of the SDLP in recent times, but it was he who prevented an agreement from being reached. He alone of all the delegated members would not allow that body to succeed. He should be condemned for that.

At the beginning of the current talks we were told that we had to accept Senator Mitchell—whether one likes it or not, he is a foreigner—as chair of the opening plenary. He was imposed on the elected representatives there because the SDLP and the Irish Government would not allow anyone else to chair the session. It appears that no one else in the world would be acceptable to them. The reason, of course, is that Senator Mitchell is Clinton's envoy. He signed the papers allowing Gerry Adams into the United States; now he is Clinton's man, sent to get Gerry Adams into the talks.

The principle of consent has been mentioned in the debate. On this occasion, no consent was sought and no consent was given by the elected representatives of the community to Senator Mitchell's acting as the supremo among the independent chairmen.

I believe it important that the talks succeed, but only if the outcome is freely negotiated among the parties.

When one looks at the documents that were presented as a basis for the inter-party talks, one notes that the Union was mentioned as a matter worthy of discussion, but that articles 2 and 3 of the Irish constitution were missing and not mentioned. The IRA has used the obnoxious and immoral articles 2 and 3 as one of its main planks and justifications for the murder and destruction of the people of the United Kingdom.

I make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government: the people of Northern Ireland want to see our Government championing the cause of the Union, of the United Kingdom, across the world. Northern Ireland is a vital part, and it ought to be a vital part, of the Union. The Government should fight tooth and nail to ensure that Northern Ireland remains a part of the United Kingdom—just as Scotland and Wales remain a part of the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) mentioned a united representation in relation to the beef crisis. There was a special case for Northern Ireland in that crisis, and I regret that it was not presented as a special case in Europe. Northern Ireland could have led the United Kingdom out of the morass in relation to the BSE crisis.

The hon. Lady referred to the bureaucracy in the health service. I inform the Secretary of State that the community is concerned about the 3 per cent. cash reduction in health service finances—and this reduction occurred after 14 years of cuts and cash reductions. Efficiency savings cannot continue without damaging the service to the people. Therefore, I appeal to Her Majesty's Government to reinstate the cash that has been taken away from the health service budget and to allow the health service to be an excellent service, as it has been in the past.

The hon. Lady said that a Labour Government would raise the issue of the police. I have talked to many members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. She said that we must deal with the make-up of the RUC. There is no reason why members of the minority communities are not represented in the RUC—it is a fair and efficient force. The door is open for all applicants, and it would serve the Church leaders and the politicians of the minority community better if they encouraged their people to join the RUC.

One thing concerns my constituents in relation to changing the make-up of the RUC. Those who have served in the RUC to this present moment may be from one community, but we must remember that they have faced 25 years of the most horrific violence. They have had courage when no one else has had courage—they stood in the gap when no one else had the courage to do so. They find it rather insulting that, after they have fought the battle, and after—God willing—the battle has been won, they are going to be told, "Thank you for your courage, thank you for your determination, thank you for your sacrifice, thank you for the lives of some of your colleagues, but it is thank you and goodbye." If a Labour Government were to pursue such a policy, I assure hon. Members that it would be opposed and resented by the vast majority of the good people who have been served by an excellent police force during very difficult times.

9.29 pm

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I shall deal immediately with the point raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). He addressed his comments about the police to my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam). If he had read our consultation paper, he would know that we do not say any such thing. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will admit that he has read the paper and that we do not make the remarks he alleges about the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Rev. William McCrea: I have read the paper and listened to the debate tonight. I cannot understand how a Labour Government would dramatically change the make-up of the Royal Ulster Constabulary without sacking many of its serving members.

Mr. Worthington: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for acknowledging, in his own way, that we do not say what he alleged in our consultation paper. It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman could not have admitted it more graciously.

Sadly, tonight's debate has been dominated by the horror of the Manchester bombing. Many people have been scarred for life, both physically and mentally, because they made the simple mistake of being in Manchester city centre at the wrong time on Saturday. I extend our sympathy to those who were the innocent victims of zealots.

We must judge the events not just by their consequences, but by their intentions. It is simply miraculous that we are not today expressing anger and grief at the loss of dozens—perhaps hundreds—of lives in the past few months. The Canary wharf bombing could have resulted in many more deaths than two and the Hammersmith bridge and Manchester bombs were intended to kill and to cause disruption on a massive scale. The IRA must be judged by its intentions—to kill many hundreds of innocent people in the past few months.

I congratulate the police and other services on reducing the intended carnage. I congratulate them also on the early progress that they have made in detecting those responsible. In the days and months ahead, it is crucial that the British and Irish Governments present a united front in responding to the challenges posed by the bombings. The business of keeping the British and Irish Governments together will not be assisted by the disparaging use of words such as "foreigner".

The killing of an Irish policeman sent shock waves around the Republic of Ireland as people realised that those who claim to be fighting for Ireland have a horrible and different vision of what Ireland would be. The Labour party rejoiced in the recent visit of President Robinson—I cannot think of anyone less deserving of the description foreigner. Her response to the weekend's events had more force for me than any other. She said that the bombing had left her "shocked, sickened and numbed." She said that she felt angry that it had been done supposedly on behalf of "an Irishness that has nothing to do with the Irishness that I stand for as President of Ireland".

The hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) referred to the questions that have been put to the IRA. He should have added that those two brutal, straight questions have been put by the Irish Government. They asked, first, whether Gerry Adams had asked the IRA for a restoration of the ceasefire and, if not, why not. What politician for peace could not answer that question immediately? Secondly, the Irish Government asked whether Sinn Fein continues to support the "armed struggle" of the IRA.

It is totally unconvincing for Adams to say that he accepts the Mitchell principles on behalf of Sinn Fein while failing to condemn the Manchester bombing. As John Bruton has said, the hypocrisy must end and the straight talking must begin. If the two countries, the two Governments and the two Parliaments stand together, we may eventually solve the problems in a peaceful and democratic way.

I listened with respect to the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) when he talked about security. He talked sense about the necessity for the two Governments to take a joint view of security and to act jointly against terrorism, but we will not achieve what is in effect a cross-border institution, which is what the hon. Member urged upon us, unless we manage to keep the two Governments together. Such a cross-border institution would be of infinite value if it provided a joint attitude to the holding of arms and to terrorism.

If it had not been for the bomb, we would have debated more fully tonight the events at the all-party talks and the forum. Those taking part in those talks and in that forum have a huge duty to demonstrate to the people of Northern Ireland that democracy can and does work. Every time posturing and grandstanding is displayed before us, we know that the only beneficiaries are the enemies of democracy. I found it much more encouraging today to read in the Belfast Telegraph about the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) praising the recent contribution of the Democratic Unionist party to the talks. The hon. Member is quoted as saying:

"I think we are seeing a significant shift in the way things are being done."

It is also encouraging to read the words of the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office—I fully understand why he is not in his place tonight—who said:

"We've had a most constructive engagement over the last few days. That engagement is producing results and I find progress that's being made encouraging."

It is crucial that all the people involved in those talks encourage the thought that progress will be made by democratic means. The Opposition believe that a solution is attainable, but it requires good will and trust, and those who seek verbally to destroy good will and trust condemn Northern Ireland to a restless and disturbed future.

The Opposition want to end direct rule. Everybody who has spoken has said that we must end direct rule, and we are all uncomfortable with the present situation. The way in which legislation for Northern Ireland is processed in the House is an affront to democracy that we wish to end. At the moment, we simply do not do justice to the people of Northern Ireland who wish to live in a free and open society where major issues of public policy are debated and consulted upon and are subject to the democratic will of the people of Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar mentioned issues such as agriculture, electricity and employment, and other hon. Members have mentioned health. I would add to that list the area that is my sphere of responsibility—education. Government policies for education are not being presented or examined coherently or fairly, and perhaps cannot be in the framework of direct rule. The people of Northern Ireland lose through that. First, the education and library boards face a funding crisis that is affecting the quality of the education of the children of Northern Ireland.

As a consequence of Government decisions and the allocation of resources, about 300 teachers were made redundant last year. I found that figure by ringing round the education and library boards and the trade unions. I should have been able to find that figure by asking the Government but, unbelievably, in response to a parliamentary question, the Minister could not tell me how many teachers were made redundant in a Province of 1.6 million people. We can imagine the anger in an English or Scottish local authority of similar size if the chair of the education authority did not know the consequences of his policies.

This year, the situation threatens to be even worse, as the Government try foolishly to cut education for tax cuts that may not be delivered. The Southern board forecasts that its schools cannot survive without further redundancies in the current year. It will seek to release 60 to 70 teachers through redundancies. The North Eastern board received an increase in its block grant of a mere 1.62 per cent., which is well below the rate of inflation. The consequences for 1996-97 will be 85 redundancies, of which 13 have already been made compulsory. In addition, much capital building work has had to be abandoned. Maintenance work has had to be curtailed to the extent that, in the board's words, it is "virtually non-existent". There are already larger class sizes and increases in the pupil-teacher ratio. Special needs services have been curtailed.

We must ask the Government why that has happened. It is a sign of the inadequacy of direct rule that we must use the Chamber as a forum for discussing such matters.

In the relatively small further education sector, 229 full-time lecturers' jobs have been made redundant since 1990. That is an average of 13 full-time staff per college. We should remember that the Government's skills audit of last week revealed that, in the FE sector, the entire nation was deficient. That, of course, includes Northern Ireland. Why do we continue to retrench and make cuts in an area where we are competitively at our weakest?

Another area in which the Government are not serving the needs of the people of Northern Ireland is nursery education. The Government, if time does not run out on them, will impose the voucher initiative. Northern Ireland desperately needs good-quality nursery education that can help boost a child's achievement throughout life, but that is not what is proposed through the voucher initiative. It will not buy good-quality education. The system will be of most use to a well-off person seeking a subsidy for private child care. It will be of least use in a deprived area where there is not enough money to provide extra spaces in the local primary school.

Extra resources should go first to those most in need, but the Government break that rule. The people of Northern Ireland, including teachers, have made it clear when talking to me that they want first-rate nursery education, not second-rate vouchers. There is no scope within direct rule to insist that Northern Ireland enjoys first-rate nursery education.

There is another area of education in which the Government are imposing dogma. The FE colleges of England, Wales and Scotland have been incorporated. Three years later, without any rationale to support the move, without any policy document and without any proposal setting out what the role of FE should be, the colleges in Northern Ireland are to be incorporated.

My experience of FE in Northern Ireland is that it is in a sad and leaderless state. At the same time, the Government's skills audit suggests that FE colleges should be playing a leadership role in Northern Ireland.

In England, Scotland and Wales, education and employment have been brought together. That has not happened in Northern Ireland. No rationale has been put forward to explain why it has not occurred. If colleges are to be incorporated, is there to be a funding council for FE, one for FE and higher education, or no funding council at all? Nothing has been said about that. What is to be the mission of FE in Northern Ireland? What is supposed to be the relationship between the Training and Employment Agency, FE and the Department of Education in Northern Ireland? Again, not a word has been said about that. That is not adequate.

We all hope for peace, and are perhaps willing to take a risk for peace, but in other respects we could be doing better. To do so, the Government must get on top of the issues that require attention.

Direct rule will be continued today with a heavy heart. We are all aware of the quality of government and political life in Northern Ireland. I feel almost apologetic for raising issues such as education in this place. In terms of Northern Ireland, the House is dominated by talk of bombs and constitutional matters. Over about 20 years of direct rule, real politics have receded. People have stopped talking about education and health issues. They have stopped talking about the very matters that impact on people's everyday lives in Northern Ireland.

We must find a way forward. Over the next few months, and perhaps years, we have a duty to find a way in which the quality of public life in Northern Ireland can be improved so that we in this place do not have to meet in these regrettable circumstances every year. When I meet the people of Northern Ireland, I am convinced of their wish to live together under a mutually fair society. It is our duty as political leaders to make that possible for them.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The quality of the debate has justified its extension to three hours. Last year, we had only an hour and a half. The debate has been wide-ranging and has been both general and particular. The easiest way for me to attempt to do justice in summing up the debate in the 15 minutes or so that remain to me is to concentrate on general matters and then deal with particular matters. I shall try to deal with each of the speeches that we heard.

I take great encouragement from the fact that no right hon. or hon. Member who spoke did other than express support for the process of political talks. Everybody who spoke wished to see the process of political talks to be a success. It is true that some thought them more realistically ambitious than others. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux) believes that it is right to begin at a low level, not on a high wire—a phrase with which those of us who count ourselves his friends are well familiar—and work upwards, and much can be said for that.

Nobody has said that the future can be determined other than by the process of talking and reaching an agreement.

Rev. McCrea indicated assent.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I see the hon. Gentleman nodding in his place as I say that.

Again there has been—I suppose that it is a corollary of the same point—total agreement that a solution cannot be imposed. The record of British Governments, English Governments over the centuries seeking to impose solutions on the misguided affairs of Ireland and Irish people—as they seemed at that time—is not particularly encouraging. I take heart from the common position that emerges from the debate.

There was another common position: the total condemnation of what has occurred; of what happened in Manchester; and of the notion that a Government of a democracy can be made to change their policies by the threatened use of violence.

I listened with particular care to what my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) said and was sorry to hear him say that he looked back over the past two years and the attitude of the Government—who from time to time he has supported—with shame. I feel that he failed to recognise some of the facets of the problems that have faced us, which are important.

It is true that Sinn Fein-IRA are different sides of the same coin, as the Prime Minister said yesterday. It is true that our ambition to see Sinn Fein as an elected party with a substantial vote, able to be represented and taking a part in the talks process has been disappointed. It has not removed its self-exclusion, and that is disappointing. It was our hope that it would. But I do not think that there is any ground for shame at all in Her Majesty's Government having sought to help it to achieve that.

I acknowledged, in response to an intervention by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs) at the beginning of the debate, that, in some respects, the Government's position had changed during the past 18 months, particularly on decommissioning. I acknowledged that, not on a point of principle but on a point of management. I realised that that would expose us to the charge of appeasement. That is not a charge that I believe to be justified, but I do not think that it is a ground for shame.

Let me say to my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne that, if we had to have a Manchester attack—of course, we did not—I would think it advantageous for that attack to result in Sinn Fein-IRA's being condemned without any qualification all around the world. I have heard no one say, "Of course it is reprehensible, but you must see that they have some legitimate grievances." We have all heard that in months and years gone by. It has been said time and again: "If only you had understood the difficulties—if only you had not been such wooden-headed English, so ignorant of Irish nationalist sensitivities." I ask right hon. and hon. Members who are present tonight if they can identify a single person anywhere who has said, "You have to understand it. The British Government could have avoided it."

That has been, as it were, the negative objective that Her Majesty's Government have had. We have, of course, had a positive objective: we have wanted the process of talks, which every hon. Member who has spoken supports, to be truly inclusive of all parties with a democratic vote or mandate. That has been the positive objective, for the obvious reason that, if we are to carry the process through to an agreement which, in turn, will be put by referendum to the people of Northern Ireland and the Republic respectively and separately, it will have a better chance of sticking if it has the support of all parties.

I have not, however, been so unrealistic as to underestimate the prospect of failure. Against that event, Her Majesty's Government have had the negative objective of peeling away from those who rely on violence to secure their political ends any support that they have previously had for violence in a democracy.

I welcome the support of the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) for the two Governments' insistence on the restoration of the ceasefire. Manchester last Saturday showed the wisdom of that. I also welcome her recognition that, if the talks cannot be fully inclusive, they should at least retain the objective of inclusivity.

Let me diverge for a moment to the speech of the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley. He took us to task for supposing that it was necessary in all circumstances to have all-party support for any outcome of the talks. That is not our position. Of course such an outcome is desirable, but we have always taken the view, and take the view today, that in any talks process it is the participants who are the masters of the proceedings. If the participants in the process that has now begun conclude that there is a measure of agreement, or any proposal less than unanimity that shall be acceptable, it is well within their remit so to decide, and for agreement to be implemented.

I must exercise confidentiality, but I have good reason to suppose that parties who object to a particular policy within that process would, as good democrats, accept the outcome. It is not a question of saying that everything must be supported by everyone participating in the talks. That would be unrealistic, and would impose a virtually unsustainable condition in many instances.

I must be selective in choosing which parts of hon. Members' speeches I shall deal with. The hon. Member for Redcar mentioned marches. In a democracy, people have the right to parade, demonstrate or express views publicly and peacefully, and I know that she recognises that. In the same way, people have a right to show what they think if they disagree, provided they do so peacefully. The issue of parades is a difficult one, as are so many things in the contemporary scene in Northern Ireland.

We are constantly seeking ways of reducing the prospects of confrontation, but there must be a spirit of compromise. In many instances, what one might describe as the loyalist institutions have shown that willingness to compromise and take a different route. The willingness to compromise has not been evident in Sinn Fein, which organised opposition to the parades and marches. We must be careful not to undermine the Chief Constable's operational responsibility for maintaining law and order, which is why it is not quite the simple proposal that people suggest when they say, "Surely it would be better to have a nice advisory committee." There are many difficulties, but we keep the matter under review. I have it much under review with the Chief Constable and the Deputy Chief Constable, Mr. Flanagan.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley spoke of the principle of consent underlying everything. That must be right in our democracy; it must be central to the viability of any outcome to the process. I welcome what he said: that the principle of consent exists in terrorists' vocabulary only as the kind of consent that people can be terrorised into giving. We are not in the business of permitting terrorisation; genuine consent must be the basis of everything.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley spoke of a new all-party committee of both Houses of Parliament to bolster the work of my right hon. Friend Lady Denton, and I acknowledge that he has been urging this for a long time. He raised the matter in the House as recently as last week's appropriation debate. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State will write to him about it, but the Northern Ireland Grand Committee, which I wish to see extend its jurisdiction and capabilities, and the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs are available to discuss economic matters generally.

Although the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley made many enticing remarks on which I should like to comment, in the interests of time I must move on to speeches that followed. My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), in a most interesting speech, said that it is time for a fundamental rethink and for a security summit. There is much to be said for a review of security co-operation by the two Governments. I said in opening that we shall base our position on the excellent security co-operation that we have at present.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke mentioned four matters: hot pursuit, co-operation, Irish air space and the sharing of intelligence, all of which should be addressed. There was much merit in his comments, which I shall refer to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and no doubt much will pass between the two Governments in seeking to improve the already excellent co-operation.

My hon. Friend said that the situation should not cause total despair. I do not want to be pedantic when I say that it should not cause any level of despair at all. It should cause renewed analysis, clarity of analysis and, if possible, greater resolution.

I very much agree with the hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy) about the influence of terrorism on the economy because of the jobs that are damaged. The other side of the coin is that the more jobs there are, the less opportunity terrorists have to lure young people in particular into their toils.

I will move quickly over the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne, much of which I could agree with—but I have disagreed in particular with the analysis that he offered. I have also addressed the speech of the hon. Member for Mid–Ulster.

I will invite the Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who has responsibility for education in Northern Ireland, to write to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on some of the matters that he raised. We have five education and library boards in a Province that has a population of 1.6 million. When we propose reducing that number to four, our ears are beaten about by people who say, "How dare you do such a thing?" That is a little obstacle to saving some money. This has been a valuable debate—

It being 10 o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [7 June].

Environmental Information

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Burns.]

10 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): This is not the first time that the importance of ensuring that the public have access to environmental information has been discussed in the House. The Government have previously indicated their agreement, at least in principle. The European Union directive on freedom of access to information about the environment has been implemented by means of the Environmental Information Regulations 1992, but a major deficiency is that they lack a specific enforcement mechanism.

More than three years ago, in July 1993, the Government's command paper on open government promised to introduce a new statutory right of access to health and safety information modelled on the regulations. It was suggested that the new right could be enforced by a tribunal and that it could deal also with complaints made under the regulations. Although there have been three Queen's Speeches since the publication of the White Paper, and although the legislative programme has not been onerous on the Government, there has been no sign of implementing that proposal.

The matter was re-examined during the passage of the Environment Bill in 1995. Last March, Viscount Ullswater stated in the other place:

"I fully agree with the wish . . . to make sure that people have adequate rights of redress under the regulations. Indeed, that is specifically required of member states by the directive."

The EC directive on freedom of access to information on the environment—to which the Government have signed up—states:

"It must be possible for the applicant for environmental information to appeal against the public authority's decision."

Viscount Ullswater added:

"Powers to create an environmental, health and safety tribunal would be included in legislation to create the health and safety access right, when parliamentary time is available."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 March 1995; Vol. 562, c. 516.]

In Committee on the Environment Bill, I introduced an amendment to allow for the creation of a specialist tribunal that could hear disputes over the provision of the access to environmental information. The Minister anticipated

"soon being in a position to create a dual-purpose tribunal that will be included in legislation to create the proposed health and safety access. Of course there is the caveat of parliamentary time, but I understand that work is now under way to deal with some of the difficulties that have been considered . . . It is well in hand."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 13 June 1995; c. 667.]

Given that the Minister insisted eight months ago that work was well in hand, perhaps the Under-Secretary replying tonight will explain whether we are any closer to establishing an environmental information tribunal. The answer appears to be no.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was questioned about the delay when he appeared before the Select Committee for Administration in January. He replied:

"A commitment was given, a promise was made, we have not delivered it so far and I want those promises honoured."

[Mr. Matthew Taylor]

It appears that the Government are happy to agree that an environmental information tribunal is needed, and are happy to give assurances that one will be created as soon as possible. But they are less happy to give a firm timetable as to exactly when a tribunal will be established, let alone accept my amendments to create one.

In the meantime, the public are denied access to a proper enforcement mechanism under the environmental information regulations, and to health and safety information. It is important to understand that, because the Government have said that the proposed right to health and safety information will not apply retrospectively, information that is now being gathered will not be accessible even when—or if—the new legislation is enacted. The longer the delay, therefore, the more information that may be withheld permanently from the public.

It may be asked whether there is reason for concern at the delays, and it may be suggested that it is not important that the delay is occurring. The fact is that the privatised water companies have refused to provide information, and British Gas has refused to provide information about contaminated lands. Railtrack even denied that the regulations applied to it, even before privatisation.

The Government have so far refused to issue further guidance, and they insist that it is for the courts to decide who is covered by the regulations. In the absence of a tribunal, that is essentially forcing people to go through expensive and possibly lengthy court proceedings—during which time the information loses its value—if they are to get any further.

An example from my own area are the efforts, with which I have occasionally helped, of the south-west solicitors Toller Beattie. They have asked for information and correspondence received from South West Water to the Department of the Environment. That information related to the delay to four bathing water schemes in the south-west and to the process under which the provisional list of sensitive areas was reduced while the list of less sensitive areas was increased—an extremely sensitive issue in the south-west.

The Department of the Environment gave a formal refusal, on the grounds that much of the information that was sought related to the confidential deliberations of the group that worked out which areas were sensitive and which were less sensitive under the urban waste water treatment directive. Further correspondence that was later produced showed that the information held had not even been considered by that group.

Surely the public have the right to know on what basis an area of bathing water has been declared sensitive, and therefore whether it may or may not be cleaned up. Surely a water company that may or may not be polluting that water should not have the right to withhold such information from the general public whom it serves.

So is there an effective alternative to a tribunal—something already in existence? The fact is that getting environmental information is difficult, and success is by no means guaranteed. There is an internal review, and internal reviews have a useful role to play in some circumstances. However, there will always be cases in which someone requesting information is thwarted, particularly if the release of information might be embarrassing to the people holding it. That is why an internal review can never be a substitute for a truly independent tribunal.

The ombudsman may also have a role, but the post of ombudsman was created for the purpose of investigating maladministration, and the ombudsman may not rule in cases in which legal rights are under consideration and there is recourse to the judicial process. Even when examining maladministration, the scope of the ombudsman is limited by statute.

Moreover, the ombudsman currently has jurisdiction over only a limited number of organisations, only has discretionary powers of review rather than a duty, he conducts investigations in private, his decisions are not legally binding, and there is no set time period for review. That is a situation which is likely to lead to delaying tactics by those holding information against those who are quite justifiably seeking that information, particularly when making it available quickly may be at the root of the issue at hand.

It is true that the courts may provide an alternative, and, in a few instances, it may be possible to argue that there has been a breach of statutory duty. It is not clear, however, whether that remedy is available in all cases. Any plaintiff in such an action will probably need to show that he or she has suffered some kind of damage, which could be exceptionally hard to demonstrate if denial of information is the issue. If one does not have the information, how can one show the damage?

There are also limitations on the right to bring an action for breach of statutory duty—for example, where actions are brought against Ministers. In such cases, the only means of compelling a public body to comply is by judicial review, a remedy that is too expensive and time-consuming for ordinary citizens, and too time-consuming for it always to be useful even to many who could afford it.

Moreover, judicial review is an inappropriate remedy for many of the complaints that arise under the regulations. It is not an effective means of challenging whether an authority has wrongly withheld information under one of the discretionary exemptions in the regulations—if the information is commercially confidential, for example—because the court will not substitute its discretion for that of an authority.

The truth is that the only suitable forum for solving such problems would be an environmental information tribunal. The Government have conceded the advantages of a tribunal for that purpose, and have said in the past that they have no objection in principle to creating one. However, those statements must be thrown into doubt by their lack of action, which is already making a material difference to those who seek such important information.

The advantages of a tribunal set up specifically to ease the flow of environmental information, and incidentally to ensure that this country meets its international obligations, are clear. First, it would be a truly independent body, favouring neither side in a dispute. Information could be reviewed in camera, and the independent body could decide whether it should be withheld on grounds of commercial confidentiality. That is an important point.

As an example of what happens as things stand, in one case the Health and Safety Executive responded by saying that it would "have to accept the manufacturer's view"

that information requested about the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 might be confidential. Such an attitude leaves it entirely in a company's hands to decide whether the public can have access to environmental information that it holds, which may be extremely important to those individuals.

Obviously there should be a requirement for cases to be reviewed within a specified time scale, which would mean that the timing of the release of information could not be manipulated to limit its impact, and delaying tactics could no longer be used with impunity. Decisions would, of course, be binding, and subject to appeal only within the current court system on a point of law. A body of precedents would eventually be established,, which would help to increase the flow of information to the public.

An environmental information tribunal should also have discretion over the payment of costs in particular cases, which should include the possibility of some cases being publicly funded, in the public interest.

The central point of the debate is that the Government have agreed that in theory there is a legal right to information, guaranteed under the EC directive on freedom of access to information on the environment, which the Government say they support. The public now have a theoretical right of access to environmental information, yet in reality, as we have seen with South West Water and several other bodies throughout the country, they can effectively be denied information about pollutants that may be affecting them personally.

The only remedy that I can think of is an environmental information tribunal, and I believe that Ministers have accepted that fact. I hope that tonight we can take a step forward, looking perhaps towards the Queen's Speech in the autumn. I hope that the Minister will now give a firm commitment and a fixed timetable for establishing such a tribunal.

As the Government have already revealed their sympathy for the idea of such a body, and as the concept has broad support, surely there is no reason to procrastinate further. We know that, unless they intend to announce a change of mind tonight, the Government support the idea, and we understand that Ministers are sympathetic to it. Indeed, through our international obligations, they have already signed up to the idea of the tribunal. So where is it?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I should make it clear at the outset that the Government have a commitment to openness and making environmental information available to the public. We have a good record over many years of doing just that.

National legislation has created more than 50 statutory public registers containing environment information. The Department of the Environment has listed them in a booklet, "Environment Facts: a guide to using public registers of environmental information", which was published in 1995. Public registers are a helpful way in which to provide access to environmental information. Potential users are made aware of what information is available and where it can be inspected, and they are not charged for it.

The Government also provide a wide range of more aggregated information in a variety of publications about the state of the environment and the factors that impinge on it. The Department of the Environment publishes an annual "Digest of Environmental Statistics", which brings together a wide range of information drawn from a large number of more detailed reports. That is supplemented by a periodic publication, "The UK Environment", which is broader in coverage, less technically oriented and aimed at a wider audience, especially schools and further education establishments. The next edition will be published in 1999.

This year, we are also introducing a new pocket-sized booklet that provides key facts about the environment. A pilot edition was produced for internal use in 1995. I shall let the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) have copies of it and a number of other publications that I am sure he will find interesting.

In March, the United Kingdom became one of the first countries to publish a set of indicators of sustainable development, which illustrates changes over the past 20 years or so in some 120 key issues and objectives. They are a preliminary set of indicators, on which we want to obtain views so that they can be developed further. In the longer term, we intend to use them to highlight key messages and monitor our performance against our stated objectives in the sustainable development strategy.

The indicators have been widely welcomed at home and abroad as a manifestation of our commitment to open reporting. It may also interest the hon. Member for Truro to know that, later this year, we intend to add the indicators of sustainable development to the Department of the Environment's world wide web site. Increasingly, information is being published in electronic form as well as on paper.

The Government's commitment to openness goes wider. In 1992, they enacted the environmental information regulations, which give the public a right of access to environmental information held by central and local government and a large number of bodies under their control. As with all freedom of access regimes, the right of access is sensibly restricted on a small number of occasions.

It is now more than three years since the regulations came into force. Although records have not been kept of the number of requests for environmental information, there is no doubt that the regulations and the Government's code of practice on open government have resulted in a large increase in the supply of environment information to the public.

The Government have actively promoted their policy of openness. For instance, in 1992, the Department of the Environment published "Green Rights and Responsibilities", which promised the citizen a right of access to environmental information. A pamphlet explaining the new access rights under the regulations was produced in 1993, and about 190,000 have been distributed to citizens advice bureaux, libraries, local authorities and other bodies, and directly to members of the public who have asked for a copy. That was followed in 1994 by a model local environment charter, "Your Council and the Environment", which detailed, among other things, the citizen's rights to environmental information from local authorities.

[Mr. James Clappison]

I have described some of the measures that the Government have taken to disseminate environmental information to members of the public. We are not complacent, and are open to suggestions about the way in which dissemination can be improved. As I said, I shall send the hon. Member for Truro some of the publications that I mentioned.

The hon. Member drew specific attention to the solicitors Toller Beattie. I am of course aware of the correspondence in which he has been involved, and the considerable correspondence in which the firm has been involved. I am aware that that firm has made very many requests of my Department for environmental information over the past two years. I understand that it has similarly requested environmental information from other Departments, the Environment Agency and local authorities.

Its requests of my Department have been addressed to a number of different branches and directorates. As the hon. Member for Truro said, the firm has particularly requested information on water pollution policy. One section alone of my Department's water and land directorate has dealt with almost 90 letters that have been addressed or referred to it in the past 21 months. I concede that not all those responses have been within the time limit specified within the regulations. That is perhaps regrettable, but there has been a large volume of correspondence. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that only comparatively rarely has information been refused, in accordance with the legitimate exceptions provided for in the regulations.

I understand that my Department has offered to hold a meeting with Toller Beattie to discuss its requirements for environmental information. I think that that would be a sensible way to proceed. I appreciate that Toller Beattie is seeking information on bathing waters, to which it may or may not be entitled.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Truro would be interested, as would his constituents—I am not sure whether Toller Beattie would be—in the most recent statistics relating to bathing water quality in the south-west. Speaking from memory, I think that the statistics show a picture of improvement. The hon. Gentleman is not dissenting, so that suggests that that is the case. His constituents, and possibly Toller Beattie, have something to welcome there. I will let the hon. Gentleman have information relating to that.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: I hope that the Minister will feel able to respond to the question of the information tribunal.

Mr. Clappison: I am afraid that, for somebody seeking more information about the environment, the hon. Gentleman's Adjournment motion was not a good start. It did not contain the necessary information. It states that the hon. Gentleman wished "to raise the subject of the availability of environmental information."

The hon. Gentleman mentioned tribunals during his speech, which I will read with interest. I will also read the interesting and complex legal arguments that he advanced. From what he said, I think that he has had his answer already in another place. Perhaps, on this occasion, a better start could have been made to seeking environmental information.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-one minutes past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

1. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from farm workers and other workers in the beef industry in West Yorkshire regarding economic suffering because of the BSE outbreak; and if he will make a statement. [32360]

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I have not received specific representations from West Yorkshire, but my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary met representatives of the rural, agricultural and allied workers group of the Transport and General Workers Union on 15 May to discuss a wide range of BSE-related issues.

Mr. O'Brien: Many people in West Yorkshire have suffered as a result of the BSE outbreak, and there are many reasons for that. What action does the Minister intend to take against the Doncaster firm, Prosper De Mulder, which allegedly produced animal feed in a way that was against the regulations laid down by the Government? The present Minister must be aware of the meetings that took place between the former Conservative Member of Parliament for Dewsbury, Mr. Whitfield, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) when Minister of Agriculture, and Mr. De Mulder.

It has been pointed out that financial contributions were made by the De Mulder company to the Dewsbury constituency Conservative party to help Mr. Whitfield in his campaign. Will the Minister join me in calling for a full inquiry into the financing by De Mulder to the Conservative party in Dewsbury? Silence on that matter will mean only further allegations of sleaze about the financing of the Tory party.

Mr. Hogg: Allegations of sleaze do the hon. Gentleman no good at all. It is not an attractive allegation and he should not have made it in this place. As to the more substantive part of his question, if any of the allegations that people were negligent or in breach of their statutory or other duties are backed by evidence, that might well be a reason for those who have or may have suffered loss to consider some legal action, but that depends on being able to establish through credible evidence some cause for action.

Sir Donald Thompson: The West Riding is a large place, and I live, as my right hon. and learned Friend knows, in the Pennines. Many people in the Pennines were encouraged by the Government and the EU to go into suckler herds, and the cattle which are now leaving their mothers are worth considerably less than they were a year or even two years ago. Does my right hon. and learned Friend have any words of hope for those cattle rearers?

Mr. Hogg: The low price that beef producers are currently receiving for their product is, of course, a matter of considerable concern. It is best addressed by a revival in market confidence, but, as the House will know, the Agriculture Council meets next week in Luxembourg and will consider a number of Commission proposals to bring support to beef producers. At the moment, two specific proposals are on the table, the first of which is a top-up to the premiums of 21 ecu and 25 ecu, and the second is an element of money—which to us will be worth about £14 million—that can be focused on beef producers in accordance with national decisions. Those proposals are on the table. They may change, but we shall be able to use those resources to address the problem that my hon. Friend identified.

Mr. Clapham: The Minister will be aware that there has been a dramatic fall in the number of beasts going into some abattoirs, including one in my constituency. That is likely to affect jobs. He will also know that the intervention board has included just 42 abattoirs on the list of those designated to deal with cattle under the 30-month scheme. The abattoir in my constituency is not on that list, and local farmers are having to travel considerable distances to abattoirs that are. Will the Minister ensure that there is a fair geographical spread, and that the list is monitored continuously so that abattoirs such as the one in my constituency, which have spent huge amounts to bring themselves up to European Union standards, are included when that becomes practicable?

Mr. Hogg: It is important to try to define our principal objective. Here we are referring to the slaughter of cattle aged over 30 months. We want to complete the process with all possible speed, because there is a substantial backlog. The intervention board has therefore tried to match renderers with abattoir capacity, and also to ensure a fair geographical spread.

We are now slaughtering up to around 27,000 cattle a week, and we have slaughtered about 150,000 since the policy got going at the beginning of May. We keep the location of abattoirs and renderers under daily review, and that is very much the responsibility of my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that our objective now is to complete the slaughter of the backlog of cattle with all possible speed.

2. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what amount has been spent to date on measures related to the BSE issue; and what is his latest estimate of future spending. [32362]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The cost to date has been around £190 million. Over the next three years, the cost will be around £1.5 billion.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The current estimates suggest that every man, woman and child will be required to pay £60—which is £250 for the average family—plus the cost of the selective cull and the cost of intervention. Can the Minister give any assurance to the general public that this massive and costly programme will actually lead to the eradication of BSE within a reasonable period?

Mr. Hogg: I share my hon. Friend's dismay about the fact that it has been necessary to spend such huge sums on the policy. I think that we all regret that. As for eradication, that is an important point. I am glad to say that we are seeing the progressive elimination of the disease. There have been about 160,000 confirmed cases so far; the high point was reached in 1992, when there were about 36,500. The number of cases is falling by 40 per cent. year on year. Last year, there were about 15,000; this year, if we took no action, we would expect about 8,000, and about 2,800 by 1998. As I have said, the disease is being eliminated. That is because of the action that we have taken on feedstuffs, about which I have spoken in the House many times.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is the Minister aware that the figures that he has given do nothing to allay the despair felt by farmers in my constituency and elsewhere about the muddle that the Government have produced in their terrible, failed attempt to resolve the crisis? Will he now tell farmers in Montgomeryshire and elsewhere when they can expect to know what system will finally be used to resolve it? When will he tell them the health grounds for the proposed increased cull, and when will he tell them what compensation the farmers will receive for the unnecessary destruction of thousands of good cattle?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. and learned Gentleman is less coherent than usual, but let me deal with compensation, which is an important point. Here, I refer to the accelerated slaughter programme. Clearly, any cattle that are slaughtered under an accelerated slaughter programme will attract compensation. The compensation will be significantly higher than that which we pay for cull cows under the 30-month slaughter scheme. We shall clearly have to embark on detailed negotiations with agriculture representatives—

Mr. Carlile: Quickly.

Mr. Hogg:—and quickly, to try to agree a fair basis for compensation.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: Now that the framework agreement is in position, will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that the Government have obtained from the European Union firm assurances that, as the steps that we are taking progress, there will be a reciprocal lifting of the various bans by the EU, so that we shall at last be returning to a fair deal?

Mr. Hogg: I do not want to deceive the House about this. Thus far, we have an agreement on the eradication plan. Last night, the Standing Veterinary Committee unanimously approved the United Kingdom eradication plan. Separate from that, although clearly related, is the Commission framework document. That document must be adopted at Florence. There is a good prospect that it will be, but it is fair to say that, as yet, it has not been. The framework document as we now see it will provide a mechanism for an early relaxation of the ban in the way that is set out in the document. That reflects our proposals.

Mr. O'Hara: Is the Minister aware of the moral outrage in the industry not only at the lack of transparency and equity in the way in which abattoirs were selected to participate in the over-30—month cull, but at the price of £87.50 per head that was negotiated—which, I am advised, is three to four times in excess of the market rate that would have been offered by abattoirs that were not allowed to tender? On a throughput of 20,000 cattle a week, that is an extra burden on the taxpayer of £1.5 million a week.

Is he further aware that the scheme's beneficiaries are using that unfair commercial advantage to undercut less favoured rivals in the business, and to negotiate deals directly with farmers, thereby cutting out auctioneers and destroying the meat market for farmers? Why was there no transparent tendering process, how was the figure of £87.50 arrived at, and how does he justify it? Most important, when will he act to correct the chaos that he has caused in the market?

Mr. Hogg: I think that the hon. Gentleman has asked 12 questions and I fancy that you, Madam Speaker, would prefer me to focus on one or so. The one that I shall focus on is the key one: why we chose the abattoirs that we did. That goes back to the point that I made to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham). Our purpose is to secure rapid implementation of the 30-month slaughter. We need to do that to clear the backlog. We have tried to choose abattoirs that are most likely most quickly to enable us to eliminate that backlog. The identification of the abattoirs is done by the intervention board, working with others, under the direct supervision of my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the farming industry appreciates the efforts that he and his colleagues have made to resolve the crisis, but that the farmers losing most are probably those selling prime beef under 30 months, due to the loss in market value? Therefore, was it not disappointing that he had to reduce the premium by 10p yesterday for the 30-month cull, because that helped to give some compensation to the beef industry generally?

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. Friend makes an important point, and I shall divide my answer in two. As to the producer selling for consumption beef under the age of 30 months, my points about the announcement at Luxembourg next week will provide some support for my right hon. Friend's constituents. His second point relates to the reduction in the top-up, which was set at 25p over and above the 85p cull cow rate. The problem with that top-up was that we were compensating for destruction at a rate higher than producers were selling for consumption, which was undesirable and created perverse economic incentives. We reduced the top-up for that reason.

Dr. Strang: Will the Minister confirm that, in addition to the 1 million cattle that will be slaughtered under the 30-month scheme, he has agreed to the slaughter and destruction of a further 150,000 cattle—mainly milking dairy cows? The Minister has acknowledged that compensation must be higher than for cull cows, but does he accept that the figure should cover the cost to the farm of losing those animals? What will be the effect on milk production and jobs? Has the Minister made any estimate of the likely cost to the taxpayer? Will he confirm that, in return for all those measures, the UK is not even getting a timetable for lifting the ban?

Mr. Hogg: I am sure that you will forgive me, Madam Speaker, if I again observe that I have been asked about six questions. I will focus on the key question. The eradication programme approved last night by the Standing Veterinary Committee provides for an accelerated slaughter scheme designed to speed the decline of BSE that has two distinct approaches. As to animals born in 1990-91 and the two following years, we will trace the farms of origin to identify animals most at risk of developing BSE, which will be subject to a compulsory cull.

However, there are no mandatory birth records for animals born before October 1990. As it would not be possible to compel farmers to participate, we must adopt a voluntary approach. Compensation rates for farmers who choose to participate will be significantly higher than those applying under the 30-month scheme. We shall consult closely with the farming community and others on the modalities, including compensation rates.

Mr. John Townend: What proportion of the £1.5 billion will be met by European Union compensation, and what proportion of that compensation will be indirectly paid by the British taxpayer because of the reduction in the UK's rebate?

Mr. Hogg: As a result of the reduction in the rebate, the UK will be paying the lion's share.

Disability Discrimination Act 1995

3. Ms Hodge: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to implement the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in the agricultural industry. [32363]

7. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps are being taken to implement the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in the forestry industry in England. [32368]

The Minister for Rural Affairs (Mr. Tim Boswell): The employment provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995—with one exception relating to trade organisations—which apply to all employers with more than 20 employees, will be commenced by 2 December 1996. Codes of practice will be available. Drafts were laid before Parliament last week.

Ms Hodge: Why has the agricultural industry, which is renowned for low wages, been singled out under the 1995 Act as the only one in which discriminatory wages have been specifically endorsed by the wages boards?

Mr. Boswell: I do not for a moment accept that the agricultural industry is unique or has been singled out. In fact, I bracketed that and the forestry industry in answering. I understand the point that the hon. Lady is seeking to address. It is precisely because my predecessors, after consultation, decided to retain the Agricultural Wages Board with its provision for a statutory minimum wage that there is any element of distinction between the treatment of agricultural employees and those in other industries.

Mr. Gerrard: Will the Minister confirm that public rights of way and public footpaths in forest areas will be covered by the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, and that, when Forestry Commission estates are sold, in particular, it will be illegal for purchasers to narrow footpaths or to do anything else to restrict access? Will he tell us precisely what he is doing to ensure that employers in the forestry industry are aware of their responsibilities under the Act?

Mr. Boswell: Those are somewhat different and disparate points. After the anticipated announcements on implementation and further advice to employers by my noble Friend, we shall be ready to give advice to employers in forestry and in agriculture on their obligations under the Act. Clearly, access provisions will be bound by the general law. On forestry disposals—which I think the hon. Gentleman has in mind—wherever possible the approach will seek to safeguard access to woods that are used extensively by securing an access agreement through the local authority. I am sure that local authorities will wish to have the specific interests of people with disabilities in mind when implementing the provisions.

Mr. Riddick: Is not the best thing we can do for disabled people to ensure that there are jobs in the British farming industry for them and for other people to take up? Towards that end, does the Minister agree that it is extremely important that we boost consumer confidence in British beef? Is it not important that we tell the British people that the incidence of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease here is no higher than in any other European country, and that the precautionary measures taken in this country probably make British beef the safest in the world to eat? Is it not the case that there is real anger among the farming industry at the way in which some food lobbyists and Labour Members—not least the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman)—have—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going quite wide of the question. I know that he was very keen to be called during a question relating directly to BSE, but the question does not relate directly to BSE. His question must relate to the Order Paper.

Mr. Riddick: It is about saving jobs.

Madam Speaker: I understand that the hon. Gentleman wants to save jobs, but he is going the wrong way about it.

Mr. Boswell: I can assure the House that the Government are as interested in securing economic and effective jobs as they are in the proper provision of facilities for people with disabilities. We shall certainly proclaim loud and clear the interests of the British beef industry on every possible and conceivable occasion.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the disabled should look at the Government's record rather than listen to the rhetoric from those on the Opposition Benches? Will he confirm that spending on the disabled has more than trebled in real terms under this Government?

Mr. Boswell: I shall have to be a little careful in answering outside my departmental responsibilities, but the Government have an excellent record on disability. I remember being modestly engaged—in my previous job at the Department for Education—in securing some of the provisions for future and higher education, in which I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment is also engaged.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister accept that agriculture, horticulture and forestry are very important employers of disabled people, and especially of disabled people with learning difficulties? Has the Minister of Agriculture read the programme of action from the Forestry Commission on dealing with disabled people? Does the Minister accept that there is a responsibility on the Minister of Agriculture and on all Cabinet members to promote employment for disabled people—if only because of its outstanding importance and our refusal to accept complacency on such matters?

Mr. Boswell: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no complacency whatever among Ministers. We seek the right balance. Among other things, we very much wish to emphasise to employers in forestry, agriculture and elsewhere their direct responsibilities under the Act and under the codes set out under the Act and the need to have regard to the interests of disabled people. It is a difficult balance to find, but we are determined to offer advice and encouragement for them to fulfil those responsibilities.

UK Food Industry

4. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking (a) to reduce the extent of regulation on the UK food industry and (b) to increase its global competitiveness. [32364]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Angela Browning): The Government's food law deregulation plan was published on 14 September 1993. It listed 29 action points. Action has already been completed on 15 of these and a further 11 are due for completion this year. In addition, the Ministry has a market task force, dedicated to improving marketing competitiveness.

Mr. Baker: The Government's activities on deregulation and the market task force are to be welcomed. I hope that my hon. Friend will do what she can to increase those activities, because they benefit the food industry, which is well poised to take advantage of world markets, not least as the common agricultural policy fades. Will my hon. Friend take action to discourage and prevent the over-zealous enforcement of food regulations by environmental health officers, which is still taking place? Does my hon. Friend agree that the last thing our excellent food industry needs is a Government formed by the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats, who are the enemies of enterprise and the apostles of over-regulation? The damage they have caused to our beef industry is already very serious.

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend is right to seek to draw a balance between the need, quite rightly, to protect the consumer and the need not to stultify enterprise in this important industry. The system which we have developed, and which environmental health officers enforce, is the HACCP system—hazard analysis critical control point. It looks at where the critical points are in food production, identifies where the risks are and applies the law proportionately. I hope that the House is aware that that system has been recognised in this country and is being emulated in others as well.

Mr. Corbett: Does the Minister not find it extraordinary that one of her hon. Friends should contemplate relaxing regulation on food when we have just been told of the colossal cost of clearing up the BSE scandal and when there has just been concern over the safety of baby milk? Would not the best answer be the establishment of a food standards agency, separate from the Minister's Department?

Mrs. Browning: No, I am not astonished. My hon. Friend the Member for North Dorset (Mr. Baker) struck the exact balance—proper enforcement proportionate to risk. I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that baby milk is quite safe.

Mr. Batiste: Is my hon. Friend aware that, over recent years, small independent abattoirs have had to pay huge sums in order to meet the standards set by new and ever-higher regulatory levels? It is precisely those abattoirs that are now facing devastation as a consequence of the application of the policy on BSE and the decision to use only the large abattoirs for that slaughter policy. Before my hon. Friend comes back to the House with proposals for the slaughter of more animals, I hope that she and her colleagues will think carefully about the need to be fair to those small independent abattoirs, particularly those which have in place adequate rendering facilities.

Mrs. Browning: I am aware of that, and I am sympathetic to the investment made by abattoirs across the country, many of which are seeking higher standards and the EU mark to enable them to export. That export market has now, unfairly, been denied to them. My hon. Friend will have heard the answer given by my right hon.

and learned Friend the Minister when he explained how those abattoirs have been selected for the 30-month cull scheme.

I must tell my hon. Friend that one of the encouraging things is that the British consumer is still eating beef. We can see in the supermarkets that there is still support in the United Kingdom for the consumption of beef. Therefore, there is an opportunity for all slaughterhouses to slaughter for consumption. Despite the importance of the cull scheme, we must not lose sight of the fact that abattoirs are still slaughtering for consumption, and that is the most important aspect.

Mrs. Golding: Does the Minister not think that food safety should come before the political dogma of deregulation? Is she prepared to risk another food crisis by sticking to the dogma that deregulation is all—important?

Mrs. Browning: We never subjugate the safety of consumers to any policy or dogma. I refute totally the hon. Lady's suggestion and I am sorry that she could not find something more constructive to say.

Mr. Spring: Is my hon. Friend aware of how efficient the farmers in my constituency are in terms of global competitiveness? Is she also aware of the high levels of optimism among cereals farmers in Suffolk, which is manifested in rising land prices? Will my hon. Friend join me in applauding the fact that that optimism has translated itself into an unemployment rate in my constituency of only 4.2 per cent.—one of the lowest anywhere in the developed world?

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the competitiveness of firms in his constituency—and, indeed, the United Kingdom in general. That is why we supported the general agreement on tariffs and trade and why we are seeking to reform the common agricultural policy and move towards world market prices as soon as possible. British farms will be well placed to compete in a global market.

Fishing Policy

5. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has for using decommissioning funds to encourage conservation–effective fishing. [32366]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Tony Baldry): The aim of any decommissioning policy should be to help bring fishing effort into better balance with what fishing stocks will bear.

Mr. Mitchell: Given that there is a conservation crisis in fishing as a result of the common fisheries policy and that there will be continuous pressure for decommissioning, would it not be more sensible not to take out conservation-effective fishing vessels, such as Grimsby's seine-netter fleet, but to rearrange the programme to give priority to taking out, first, the bigger and more efficient vessels, those whose activities are more damaging to conservation and the environment and those vessels whose track record shows that they have been making the biggest catches? Would it not also be sensible to do that on a Europe wide basis? If we do it alone, we shall simply ensure that the stocks that we save are looted by over-large foreign fleets.

Mr. Baldry: I made it clear to the Council of Ministers the other day that its forthcoming decommissioning proposals, which do not make any provision for decommissioning industrial fishing vessels, are crazy. Industrial fishing does enormous damage, especially to stocks in the North sea. I have also made it clear that we will not contemplate any further large-scale decommissioning of the UK fleet until we have made some substantial progress on the issue of quota hoppers.

I find the Labour party's approach to the whole issue somewhat surprising, given the comments of the Labour Member of the European Parliament who represents the hon. Gentleman's area—Peter Crampton—who describes himself as the Labour party fisheries spokesman in Europe. He appears to have welcomed the 40 per cent. reduction in the UK fishing fleet. I find that very strange indeed.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend will be aware from his recent visit to the Wash inshore fishery that conservation is of paramount importance. Is he aware that the current dredging programme is causing great concern to local fishermen? Will he confirm that the promised monitoring programme and consultation process are actually in place and working?

Mr. Baldry: I visited my hon. Friend's constituency last year specifically to look at the whole issue of dredging. I fully appreciate that concerns about dredging were raised with me at that time. I am confident that the monitoring programme is being assiduously carried out.

Cattle Slaughter Scheme

6. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest weekly figure for the number of animals slaughtered under the 30-month scheme in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [32367]

Mr. Baldry: Just under 20,000 animals were slaughtered in England and Wales under the 30-month scheme in the week ending 16 June.

Mr. Llwyd: I thank the Minister for that answer. Is he aware that, this time last year, a 600 kg live-weight beef animal would have realised about £786? Even with the 25p per kilogram top-up payment, there is now a loss of more than £90 per animal. With this week's cut in the premium to a measly 15p per kilogram, the loss will be about £158 per animal.

Does the hon. Gentleman realise how important that sort of animal is to a small mixed farm? Will he explain his remarks earlier this week, when he said that it was now clear that the market had developed in such a way that the premium could not be justified? He seemed to be saying that somehow the market had made up for the premium, which is arrant nonsense. Will he please explain?

Mr. Baldry: Let us all be quite clear about the purpose of the top-up: it is for clean beef, steers and heifers, which we would have expected to come into the human food chain. As of 20 March, it was clear that some farmers would not have them ready to enter the food chain. The advice of the Meat and Livestock Commission and others was that there was an incentive for farmers to hold back those cattle to be slaughtered under the 30-month scheme rather than putting them into the human food chain. That is a crazy situation.

We took factual and accurate advice from the Meat and Livestock Commission, and the 15p top-up premium as from 16 June reflects the market price. It also reflects the fact that it is now more advantageous for farmers to sell their cattle into the human food chain than to sell them into the 30-month scheme. That must be right.

It is also fair and proper to ensure that anyone who has cattle under the scheme as of 16 June, who may not have been able to get them into the slaughter programme, will have the benefit of the top-up from whenever those cattle are slaughtered. In fact, we are talking about cattle that were well over 30 months on 20 March.

Sir John Cope: Does not the progress made from the over-30-months cull to the agreement on eradication and now the possibility of agreement on a framework document show that my right hon. Friends were entirely right to use the veto in the Community and thereby to bring beef to the top of the agenda? They have brought us to a position where we are now very close to an agreement that we can all back.

Mr. Baldry: Yes. Having, along with other ministerial colleagues over the past few weeks, spoken to many fellow Agriculture Ministers and other Ministers elsewhere in the European Community, I am convinced that if we had not pursued the policy of non-co-operation, we would not have made such positive progress in seeking to lift the export ban on UK beef.

Mr. Salmond: But have not the Minister and his colleagues achieved an armistice in the beef war by agreeing to a level of eradication and slaughter that the Minister of Agriculture previously said that he would not agree to? Is not the House entitled to understand, therefore, that the past month of posturing has been at best irrelevant and at worst positively damaging? Is it not reasonable to expect to see a white flag of surrender over Downing street this afternoon?

Mr. Baldry: With respect, all that is disingenuous twaddle. No one looks for the lifting of the export ban more keenly than beef producers in Scotland, and I cannot believe that any beef producer in Scotland will look with any respect at the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Sir Jim Spicer: Does my hon. Friend accept that behind the words "an accelerated programme" lies devastation for many of our dairy herds? Does he accept that those of us who come from dairy-producing areas welcome today what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister has said—that there will be increased compensation for animals that have to be slaughtered under the scheme? Will my hon. Friend confirm that there will be compensation not just for the loss of the animal, but for lost production from that animal? Can my hon. Friend assure us that there will be compassion and common sense in the way in which the programme is operated?

Mr. Baldry: I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend on all those points. This morning, I again met the deputy president of the National Farmers Union—the president is abroad—and the president of the Country Landowners Association to start the process of discussion on the details of compensation between the Government and the farming industry, including from next week the farming industry in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. We shall, of course, listen carefully to what the farming industry says about compensation. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister has made clear, compensation will be at significantly higher rates than under the over-30-months scheme.

We shall, of course, listen carefully to what the industry says about the various elements of compensation, not least the representations that it makes to us about consequential loss. In those discussions and negotiations, we shall discuss the practicalities of the scheme, such as how pregnant cows will be dealt with. There will be as much understanding as possible about the impact on the livelihood of individual farmers.

Agricultural Pollution

8. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent correspondence he has received from representatives of local authorities concerning Government policy on agricultural pollution. [32369]

Mr. Boswell: The Department has received correspondence this year from representatives of local authorities on a range of agricultural pollution issues, including the land-spreading of waste and recycling of farm plastics.

Mr. Flynn: Have not the Government's foolish deregulation policies led to contamination by muck flowing from the rendering industries, particularly in Ashford in Kent, where the products of the rendering industries, possibly contaminated by BSE, are now polluting the environment? The Government have been soft on regulation, and that has created pollution. Is it not right that the country will never again trust the Government to ensure the safety and purity of British food?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman is entirely off beam. It is precisely as a result of our stringent legislation and the provision of the new Environment Agency that such matters—including the discharge of waters to agricultural land—are closely regulated. The case that the hon. Gentleman cites relates to treated water from an effluent plant that is discharged in the way that he caricatured. It is subject to all the regulations of the Environment Agency and, to the best of our knowledge and information, they are complied with in full. Any breaches of that legislation will be rigorously pursued.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 20 June. [32391]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Evans: Will my right hon. Friend ignore advice from the Opposition, who would sign away Britain's vital interests to some European super-state? When he meets European leaders in Florence tomorrow, will he remind them of Britain's economic success, and will he continue to fight robustly for Britain's interests in Europe, in contrast with the Opposition, who would fight for Europe's interests in Britain?

The Prime Minister: It is certainly the case that the principal Opposition party would jeopardise the rebate, undermine the veto and follow policies in Europe which certainly would not add to employment and would damage our position here and in Europe. I confirm that we shall not remotely follow any of those policies. We have a crowded agenda to address at the summit at Florence this weekend—on the intergovernmental conference, unemployment and economic issues—and I hope to get a resolution of the beef dispute.

Mr. Blair: Under the European Commission proposal, when does the Prime Minister think that the ban on beef will finally be lifted? Obviously, I am asking not for a precise date, but for the approximate time when he now expects it to be lifted.

The Prime Minister: We do not yet have an agreement on the framework. There is unanimous agreement by the Standing Veterinary Committee on the eradication plan, which is a great step forward. The agreement on the framework document remains to be achieved and I hope to reach an agreement in Florence. I am not certain that I will, but I certainly hope that it will be possible. After then, it will be for us—not the Commission—to determine the dates, as it will depend on the steps that we have to take. I would expect that, provided that we can reach agreement in Florence, we shall begin to see the lifting of the ban in the early autumn, but that will depend on negotiations still to come.

Mr. Blair: The question is not when it will begin, but when it will end. Perhaps the Prime Minister will confirm the following about the deal. First, there is no date on the deal. Secondly, there are no guarantees; indeed, any part of the ban being lifted has to be referred to a committee which is under no obligation to accept it. Thirdly, he has had to concede extra cattle to be slaughtered, although there is no scientific basis for it. Fourthly, there is no lifting of the third country ban and, fifthly, there is no deal on additional compensation, though we shall be spending billions on it for years to come. If those points are correct, is not calling it a triumph, as some Ministers have today, an utter travesty of the truth?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong in almost every aspect of what he has just said. Let me make it clear to him that, but for the action that we have taken, we would be nowhere near the deal that it may be possible to strike this weekend. In the first eight weeks after the ban was imposed, nothing whatever was offered to us by our European partners. In the four weeks since we began a process of non-co-operation, we have reached agreement on the eradication plan and reached agreement with the Commission on a framework. I hope that we shall reach agreement with our partners on a framework to enable us to begin to move towards lifting the ban.

The right hon. Gentleman is quite wrong about the slaughter of extra animals. No animal that would not have been slaughtered is now to be slaughtered. All those animals would have been caught by the 30-months-plus plan. Almost every one of the statements that the right hon. Gentleman has just made shows a profound misunderstanding of the whole negotiation.

Mr. Blair: My understanding is based on the European Commission document.

The Prime Minister indicated dissent.

Mr. Blair: Then perhaps the Prime Minister will answer the question that was put to him: when does he expect the ban finally to be lifted? I suspect that the reason why he will not give us an estimate is that, if he did so, the period would be in years, not months. That is why he does not want to give it. Is not the truth that he is now so desperate to extricate himself from this mess that he will settle for anything? There is humiliation in the deal. There is ignominy in the deal. In fact, it is not a deal at all: it is a rout.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman's position is wholly idiotic. Not only that, but now that he is talking in that fashion, he might bear in mind that his hon. Friend the shadow Minister of Agriculture supported the ban, against the interests of this country, after it was proposed. First the right hon. Gentleman says that he supports our policy and that we must negotiate an agreement. Then, when we do negotiate an agreement, he changes his position. The fact of the matter is that there would have been no chance of an agreement, but for the policy of non-co-operation that we have followed. We are now within a few hours, with luck, of getting an agreement in Florence—and that is no thanks to the policies of the Opposition, who right from the outset have done all that they can for party advantage, notwithstanding the damage to the British agricultural industry.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I wonder whether my right hon. Friend remembers the old cowboy movies that he must have watched in his youth. In that context, if one of our colleagues had gone to Germany and told a German audience that he would never be prepared to see Britain isolated in Europe, and that he would therefore be prepared to give up the veto, but then told a British audience that he would never give up the veto because Britain might have to be isolated in Europe, would my right hon. Friend be justified in saying to that person, "Paleface speak with forked tongue?"

The Prime Minister: When the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) went to Germany, I at least did not expect him while he was there to attack a policy that he was nominally supporting in this country. But instead, to curry favour with his hosts, he rolls over on his back with his feet in the air.

Mr. Ashdown: I did not support the Government in the policy of confrontation. Is it not perfectly clear that the Prime Minister, having again marched his troops to the top of the hill in Brussels, is now engaged once more in uselessly marching them back down again? What is the cost of all that folly, the terrible damage to Britain's influence abroad and to respect for this country?

There is muddle, confusion and chaos at home, and we are now required to slaughter more animals. The Prime Minister says none, but the National Farmers Union says 66,000. Brussels is to police the scheme; there is no starting date, no timetable, no clear phasing and no binding response from our colleagues. What words will the Prime Minister now use to convince us all that this is the brilliant and decisive victory that he has predicted all along?

The Prime Minister: Yet again the right hon. Gentleman shows his breathtaking capacity to understand nothing. He is wrong on almost every aspect, as he will discover at the end of the discussions in Florence, when we will have finally dealt with the matter. We would still be waiting for any movement towards the lifting of the ban by Christmas or later, had we followed the policy that he advocated. As it is, we are close to an agreement that will be in the interests of the British agriculture industry. He says that he is interested in the agriculture industry when he is in his constituency, but when he is in the Chamber he just wants to make silly points.

Sir Peter Hordern: Did my right hon. Friend read the remarks that Mr. Henkel made at the conference attended by the Leader of the Opposition? He said that unemployment in Germany was continuing to increase, whereas in Britain it had fallen by 20 per cent., that the rate of taxes on retained profits in Germany was twice as high as in Britain, and that Britain was the enterprise centre of Europe. Is it not the case that we are doing rather well at cricket, our footballers are playing like heroes and my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) is nearly 80 years old? We are moving towards a position where all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds, so why let Labour ruin it?

The Prime Minister: Mr. Henkel, the president of the Bundesverband der Deutschen Industrie, said more than that: he pointed out that we had received 10 times as much investment from outside Europe as Germany had, despite the fact that Germany was a larger economy. What is rather strange is that the celebrated guest at that great meeting where the president of the BDI paid those compliments to the United Kingdom would like to change all the policies that have made this country so successful.

Q2. Mr. Simpson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 20 June. [32392]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Simpson: Will the Prime Minister comment on his deputy's claim on "Today" that the culling of a further 65,000 cows amounts to no more than "a handful" of cattle? How does he square that with yesterday's comment by the Minister of Agriculture that any suggestions of a further cull were completely untrue? Will he give the House and the public two simple assurances: first, that the Government will guarantee full compensation to farmers for the reconstruction of the national herd and, secondly, that a sizeable contribution from Europe will now form a core part of the framework agreement that he has negotiated?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong to suggest that 67,000 additional animals are to be slaughtered, That is not remotely the case. Every one of those animals was going to be slaughtered in any event. Not a single extra animal will be slaughtered. [Interruption.] One can always tell when the Opposition do not like what they are hearing. Not a single extra animal will be slaughtered, so the hon. Gentleman's question is based on total nonsense.

Q3. Mr. Butler: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 20 June. [32393]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Butler: May I wish my right hon. Friend a most enjoyable weekend break in Florence? So as to ensure that it is enjoyable also for Conservative Members, will he make it clear from the start, and again at the end, that he will accept no weakening of the British veto and no extension of qualified majority voting?

The Prime Minister: Weekends in Florence are always enjoyable, as I have learnt on many occasions in the past. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] It is a lovely place, and I am looking forward to an enjoyable weekend there. And I can ensure that my hon. Friend enjoys both this and subsequent afternoons by giving him both the assurances for which he asks.

Mr. Garrett: Why do the Government refuse to support the International Labour Organisation's convention on home workers when this country has 1.5 million home workers, many thousands of whom earn less than £2 an hour, and many of whom earn less than £1 an hour? These people have no protection or rights under our existing legislation. Does that not show a quite incredible callousness?

The Prime Minister: Not remotely. A large number of people in this country are in work rather than unemployed precisely because we do not have the sort of legislation that the hon. Gentleman prefers. I happen to take the view that policies, whether the hon. Gentleman likes or dislikes them, are for this House and should not be pushed upon us by bodies such as the ILO.

Q4. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 20 June. [32394]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dunn: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is no part of his Government's policy to impose regional government and regional assemblies on the British people, which would mean yet another tier of government, more expense, more bureaucracy and more interference and would be a nightmare for the British taxpayer?

The Prime Minister: I certainly agree that regional assemblies would be a total irrelevance, were they to be introduced. They are proposed by the Labour party only because it knows that its plans for a tax-raising Scottish Assembly are untenable unless it moves into this nonsense. The Labour leader is rather confused about this policy. He said on one occasion, "We are not committed to regional assemblies," and then on another occasion he said that regions should have assemblies. On this issue, not only does he disagree with his colleagues—he disagrees with himself.

The Berkshire (Structural Change) Order 1996.]

Mrs. Taylor: I thank the Leader of the House for that information. Can he tell us today whether the Prime Minister will make a statement on Monday on the outcome of his meeting in Florence? Will the Leader of the House ensure that the House is given the opportunity to vote on a substantive Government motion on any specific proposals on BSE which are decided upon as a result of any decisions in Florence this weekend, not least because such a vote will be of great interest, when we see the details, to hon. Members on both sides of the House?

The Leader of the House announced that the remaining stages of the Broadcasting Bill will be held on Monday and Tuesday of the week after next. Will the Leader of the House confirm that the Government will not seek to overturn the amendments that were tabled in Committee by the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes), which were carried with all-party support? Those amendments, as I am sure the Leader of the House is aware, will do much in the next decade to improve the accessibility of television for the deaf and visually impaired. He will realise that those amendments are important for the individuals involved and I hope that he will agree that it would be shameful if the House were to try to overturn those amendments. Will he confirm that the Government will not seek to do so?

On another important issue, the Leader of the House will be aware of the Government defeat in the House of Lords on Monday on nursery vouchers. The Nursery Education and Grant-Maintained Schools Bill was discussed and an eminently sensible amendment, to defer the implementation of the scheme until evaluation of the pilots could take place, was passed. We know that the Leader of the House has had a letter from the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which suggests that the Government may experience difficulty overturning the amendment in the Commons and also suggests measures for circumventing the decision in the Lords. Are the Government so fearful of their case that they intend to avoid facing that issue again in the Commons? Would it not be wise to take on board the evidence that comes from those pilots before the final implementation of that rather foolish scheme?

May I also ask the Leader of the House, wearing his hat as Chairman of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges, whether he can confirm that the Select Committee should be ready to make its report on conduct in the next couple of weeks? Will he, as Leader of the House, guarantee that time will be found before the summer recess so that the House can debate and, I hope, accept the recommendations in that report?

Finally, is the Leader of the House aware that his colleagues in the Home Office are such great admirers of Labour Back Benchers that they have adopted the ideas of at least three private Member's Bills, including those on stalking, on paedophiles and on an amendment to the Public Order Act 1986? Will the Leader of the House ensure that the adoption of those ideas by Home Office Ministers is not used as an excuse to block the measures when they go through their remaining stages? Good ideas are still good ideas even when they come from Labour Members.

Mr. Newton: I shall work backwards. The hon. Lady's last remarks were pretty silly, not least because the national campaigners on stalking have made it clear that they acknowledge the defects in the Opposition Bill and think that the Government are acting appropriately by bringing forward their proposals. That is the sensible and responsible way to behave and the hon. Lady may regret her comments when she reflects on them.

On the subject of the Nolan report, I am happy to pay tribute to the hon. Lady for her helpful and constructive approach in the proceedings of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges. I can confirm that I am reasonably hopeful now that the Select Committee will be able to produce a report before the recess. I take note of her wish and, I guess, that of others in the House that, if it proves practicable, we should seek an opportunity for a debate. I am bound to say, however, that the pressures on time are mounting all the time.

On the subject of nursery vouchers, the hon. Lady will understand if I say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has taken careful note of the amendment passed in another place on Monday night, but we have always said that we would evaluate the phase 1 pilots. The results that have been gathered show that the parents in phase 1 are positive about the scheme and we have every intention of ensuring that we can introduce vouchers for all four-year-olds in England from April 1997.

On the subject of the Broadcasting Bill, I am sure that the hon. Lady would not expect me to anticipate debates in 10 days' time, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage will be sympathetic to the general concerns of disabled people, as I am, as a former Minister for disabled people. I will bring her remarks to my right hon. Friend's attention.

Lastly, I can confirm that I expect my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to make a statement after the Florence summit. Any question about debates can be resolved only when we know the summit's outcome.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): As the House did not have an opportunity to debate whether Members' televisions in their rooms should have a direct feed from the Floor of the House, may we have a debate to consider the effect of that provision? It may be true that hon. Members are now hearing more debates than they heard before as they can watch them in their rooms while working on constituency mail and so on, but the effect on attendance on the Floor of the House and the impression created outside has been awful. If we cannot have a system whereby, if Members are watching in their rooms, a hologram of them appears in their place on the Floor of the House, perhaps we could at least have a system whereby the outside television sets show more than one picture—not just the Floor of the House, but the Standing and Select Committees that are taking place at the same time.

Mr. Newton: I cannot conceive of any hologram that would be an adequate substitute for my right hon. Friend. While I am aware of the sort of concerns that my right hon. Friend has expressed, there would be a revolution among hon. Members if we attempted to go back from the present position to where we were. I am certainly anxious to play my part in any efforts to bring home to the public outside how much work goes on in this place all the time, not necessarily on the Floor of the Chamber.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I was interested to see that the Government have put off the debate on local government reorganisation for a week. I was disappointed that they still expect it to take place in the same sort of time as it was originally allocated next week. As some of the reorganisation plans are contentious and the average time allocated for each one is currently only 20 minutes, would it not be more sensible to allow for a comparatively short debate on the non-contentious plans and to allow the more contentious ones to be debated at greater length, according to their worth?

Mr. Newton: I am not aware that any of the plans are particularly contentious. I said that I would reflect on the points raised by Liberal Democrats last week, and by the hon. Gentleman with me privately. I have come to the conclusion that what I have proposed seems to be the most sensible course. The earlier, significantly greater, number of local government orders were debated together and did not take up all the time allocated to them on the Floor of the House—I think that they took up roughly the sort of time that I am proposing on this occasion.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we have a debate next week on early-day motion 940?

[That this House recognises that a report by Ealing Council into efforts to manipulate the housing list by two Labour councillors, who are prospective parliamentary candidates, shows that their conduct in this matter was extremely suspect and inappropriate and that it further shows that both of these individuals attended court in order to seek to influence legal proceedings instituted by the council to evict unlawful tenants; recognises that their efforts to retain known Labour voters in an illegal council tenancy with the deliberate aim of increasing Labour Party support in the Perivale Ward of Ealing was unfair to the 10,000 people on the housing waiting list and political gerrymandering of the gravest kind; and calls upon the National Executive of the Labour Party to examine their suitability as prospective parliamentary candidates.]

It takes to task two Labour councillors in Ealing who have corruptly been seeking to obtain Labour council accommodation for Labour voters. That issue should be exposed on the Floor of the House for the evil and disgrace that it is, and for the unfairness that it creates for the 10,000 people on the housing list who are not Labour voters.

Mr. Newton: I share my hon. Friend's concern at what is alleged to have happened in that case. I am sure that the people of Ealing will be no less interested than my hon. Friend in the findings of the independent inquiry, which I understand is looking into the matter.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): May we have a statement soon clarifying the Government's intentions regarding the date of the general election in view of the report in today's edition of The Independent that Downing street is preparing contingency plans for an October election? Apparently, it all depends on whether England win Euro 96. Are Ministers so depressed about their own performance that they now depend on Gazza's performance?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman should not believe everything that he reads in the newspapers.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Following the astonishing news last week that the two countries that last year voted not to join the European Economic Community are doing wonderfully well in terms of jobs and trade when compared with those that voted to join, which appear to be in an appalling financial mess, may we have an early debate next week on the narrow issue of the huge advantages that nations can gain by not joining the EEC?

Mr. Newton: I have no plans for such a debate, but perhaps my hon. Friend will catch your eye, Madam Speaker, in the debate that is to take place after my right hon. Friend's statement today. I remind my hon. Friend of what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said not so many minutes ago about the excellent performance that this country is putting in on the economic front inside the European Union.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the Leader of the House find Government time to debate holiday flights, particularly charter flights, on aircraft that are not registered in Britain and fly out of here with British holidaymakers to a third destination? He will be aware that his noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping made a statement yesterday that appeared to deal with this but in fact guaranteed only that such flights will be able to change their country of registration after 1 August. It does not offer protection to holidaymakers. I hope that the Leader of the House is taking this seriously. It will be too late when a plane full of British holidaymakers has gone down because we did not take action to ensure that the planes are safe.

Mr. Newton: I always take seriously points made by the hon. Lady, and my noble Friend's attention was drawn to the fact that she has raised these matters with me before. I shall now draw his attention to the fact that she does not regard the remarks made yesterday in another place as adequate. I am sure that he will consider what the hon. Lady has said.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Central Railway plc has applied for an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992 but that the Secretary of State for Transport decided that because the matter is of national significance it should be debated and voted on by both Houses of Parliament, and the earliest date when this could take place is Monday 22 July? Because of the massive blight and uncertainty that the proposal is causing all along the route, will my right hon. Friend do everything to ensure that the debate and vote does indeed take place during the week beginning Monday 22 July?

Mr. Newton: I said last week that I expect that the House will sit well into the second half of July, and I can assure my hon. Friend that I share his hope that it will be possible to deal with this matter before the summer recess.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On the question of an election in the autumn, will the Leader of the House comment or get somebody to make a statement on the significant fact that the Government are clearing up all the business so that there will not be an overspill period in October? As we have not had an announcement about the recess either, we are bound to draw the conclusion that the Government are trying to provide a contingency arrangement for an election in October or November. My real interest is whether I have to order the envelopes.

Mr. Newton: The only thing that I can say about the envelopes is that the hon. Gentleman will need them some time within the next year. As for the rest of his good-natured but mischievous question, I can tell him that it now looks virtually certain that there will be an overspill and that the Government are well advanced with planning a significant legislative programme for the next Session.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): In view of the decision of the Transport Council of the EU in recent days to arrogate to the EU the right to negotiate international air service agreements, which hitherto has been the prerogative entirely of sovereign states, can my right hon. Friend persuade the Secretary of State for Transport to come to the House to explain what the implications might be, particularly for my constituents, many of whom work at Heathrow, which is, of course, the premier gateway into Europe and a vital source of revenue for the economy and the local community?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is well aware of the Government's sympathy, and that of my right hon. Friend the Transport Secretary, for his position. I shall bring his request to my right hon. Friend's attention.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South–West): Will the Leader of the House ensure that, when we debate bovine spongiform encephalopathy next week, we are given a final figure for the number of cattle that are to be culled? My farmers are very worried about the number that is being mooted, be it 20,000, 45,000, 150,000 or more. They are in disarray. They are dismayed by the cut in top-up support premium from 25p to 10p. Will he assure the House that the Minister will finally come up with a figure next week?

Mr. Newton: I am sure that, in the wake of the discussions that will take place in Florence—which were much discussed during Prime Minister's Question Time—both my right hon. Friend and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister will seek to clarify the position as soon as they can. I must, however, reiterate what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on several occasions. All the cattle that have been the subject of some rather exaggerated—indeed, simply wrong—reports in today's newspapers, being by definition considerably more than 30 months old, would have been slaughtered anyway.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): My right hon. Friend will know that this morning the Trade and Industry Select Committee published its report on the affairs of BMARC. He will also know that the report wholly exonerates my right hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Mr. Aitken), and clears him and others of any wrongdoing.

My right hon. Friend may also be aware that last night Messrs Goodman Derrick, solicitors acting for Granada Television, wrote to the Clerk of the Select Committee seeking to prevent this morning's news conference from taking place and publicising those facts. It would seem that Granada Television believes that it is in the public interest to publish smears, lies and allegations against a Member of Parliament, but that it is not in order for a Select Committee of the House to give publicity to the truth. Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the Select Committee report to be debated as a matter of urgency, so that these matters can be fully and properly aired and the practices perpetrated by Granada can be exposed?

Mr. Newton: I share my hon. Friend's interest in the steps that he tells us were taken last night. I am sure that they will be widely noted. As for the Select Committee report, debates on such reports usually—although not always—take place after being selected by the Liaison Committee to fill the slots that are available. I will draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) to my hon. Friend's suggestion. I can also confirm that the report found nothing to substantiate the allegations against my right hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Mr. Aitken).

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): The 10,000 people in the Calder Valley in my constituency who signed a petition against the imposition of nursery vouchers will be very disappointed by the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that vouchers will be imposed by 1997. When does the Secretary of State for Education and Employment intend to bring the issue back to the House, and how can the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that the House will pass the legislation?

Mr. Newton: I cannot answer the latter question at this stage, because the Nursery Education and Grant-Maintained Schools Bill is still being dealt with in another place. As for the hon. Lady's first point, I find her attitude extraordinary. She used the word "imposed", but nothing is being imposed on anyone. What is being offered is an additional choice.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May we have a debate next week on early-day motion 1015?

[That this House notes the failure of the BBC Television Panorama programme of Monday 17th June to draw a curious connection to the attention of their viewers; namely, that in an attempt to portray incompetence by the Conservative government, they focused on a farm near Ashford, Kent, alleging at the least irresponsible management leading to the spread of BSE, and hinting at a possible connection with three CJD cases in East Kent; and notes that they displayed the proprietors of the farm to be R. Sternberg of Plurenden Farm, but significantly failed to mention that this referred to the late Rudy Sternberg, a personal friend of the late Harold Wilson, who was created a Life Peer by the then Labour Prime Minister in the style and title of Baron Plurenden, ostensibly for services to British agriculture.]

Such a debate would enable us to investigate the quality of the research done by television programmes. It is clear from the "Panorama" programme about BSE that the intention was to rubbish the Government's work in dealing with the disease.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): It was very successful.

Mr. Arnold: The hon. Gentleman says that it was successful. Who was the proprietor of the farm featured in the programme? No less than Rudy Sternberg, who was made a life peer by the Labour Prime Minister Harold Wilson for services to agriculture. Perhaps, while aiming to hit the Conservative Government, "Panorama" accidentally ripped the scab off Labour sleaze that took place at the time of the Harold Wilson Government.

Mr. Newton: That is an interesting point. It is always a matter of concern when programmes purporting to give a factual account of events seem to omit details that might be relevant. I am sure that, in the light of what he has said, my hon. Friend will want to pay tribute to the steps taken by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to introduce greater transparency in the honours system.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): On 23 February, the junior Health Minister, with great fanfare, announced a £50 million powered wheelchair programme. In May, the Department finally got round to issuing some guidelines, but there seem to be tremendous problems in gaining access to the provisions that are supposed to have been established. May we have a debate about the matter?

Mr. Newton: I cannot sensibly promise a debate alongside all the other pressures that have been put on me for debates in the past couple of weeks, but I will bring the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): May I ask my right hon. Friend for a debate on London Transport so that the House can condemn the proposed series of one-day strikes that will disrupt the lives of thousands of my constituents and many hundreds of thousands of Londoners? During such a debate, one could contrast that negative approach with the Government's positive approach in improving the Northern line, in extending the Jubilee line, in encouraging the Heathrow to Paddington link and in improving the Docklands light railway.

Mr. Newton: The whole House is, or should be, disappointed about ASLEF's proposed action. As we have seen time and again, such strikes do not benefit anyone, least of all the travelling public. They will prevent them from enjoying the benefits of the various Government measures to which my hon. Friend has referred. I hope that we might hear some words of condemnation from Labour Front-Bench Members, but I suspect that that is a triumph of hope over experience.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North–East): In regard to the jobseeker's regulations, I would be grateful if the Leader of the House brought a Minister to the House to make a statement and to order an inquiry into the death of my constituent, Thomas Causon. In the month since his death, his mother has been unable to establish and to apportion blame for the death. He was 40 years old, had a serious epilepsy condition and was receiving medication, but he was forced to attend an interview. He understood, perhaps mistakenly, that, unless he attended the particular job that he was sent to, he would lose benefit. The job involved painting and decorating outside in bitterly cold weather. Unfortunately, he collapsed and died, but his mother has been unable to establish whether the procedures adopted under the jobseeker's regulations were appropriately applied.

Mr. Newton: In the light of what the hon. Gentleman has said, the whole House would want to express its sympathy to the family involved. He will understand that it would not be appropriate for me to comment further without any further information about the circumstances. I will, of course, bring his points to the attention of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Social Security and for Education and Employment, who are both here to answer questions next week.

Mr. Flynn: When may we have a debate on television advertising so that we can congratulate the Independent Television Commission, which, in the past couple of hours, has instructed television companies not to show an ASDA advertisement featuring an actress that is designed to push medicinal drugs, in particular paracetamol, which kills twice as many people as heroin in almost every year—it certainly did so last year—and a series of drugs called co-proxamol, which also kills more than 200 people a year? Is ASDA not wrong to make those drugs more accessible to children as young as 12 by cutting the price of those drugs and by advertising them on television? Should not we be protected in our homes from drug pushers?

Mr. Newton: As some of the hon. Gentleman's points are fresh to me and as, I must admit, I doubt whether it is right for him to accuse ASDA of irresponsibility, the sensible and right course is for me to bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, and to make the point that television advertising might be in order when we return to proceedings on the Broadcasting Bill in 10 days' time.

Retail Development

3.58 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): I am pleased to announce that I have today published the Government's revised planning policy guidance note on town centres and retail development, which honours our pledge to the Select Committee on the Environment in the Government's response to the Committee's inquiry, "Shopping Centres and their Future". The Select Committee endorsed our policy, but asked for it to be clearer and stronger. We consulted on the revised document last July. That attracted considerable support in more than 500 responses and also proposed numerous useful suggestions, many of which have been incorporated in the final version.

The revised guidance note is a further landmark in our planning policies for revitalising town centres, and it emphasises our determination to maintain and enhance them. On returning from the United Nations conference Habitat II in Istanbul, I am more than ever convinced that cities and towns are the heart of our civilisation and that we need their life and vigour for our survival.

Towns are where most of our population live, work and shop and where much of the 4.4 million growth in households projected for 1991 to 2016 will need to be located. It is where we should be encouraging the location of shops, offices, leisure and housing. People have mistakenly characterised our policy as a ban on out-of-town development—all stick and no carrot. We must encourage sustainable development that helps make towns and cities attractive places to be, attractive to those who work and live there, and attractive to those who visit. We want to encourage urban regeneration and focus development in existing centres.

We are proposing a planning policy that promotes development in town centres. We want development plans to contain the positive message that development is welcome here—and to say where in general terms and, if possible, to identify sites. Developers and occupiers—whether retailers, firms needing office space, leisure operators and others who attract a lot of people—all need greater certainty from the planning system. To create that climate of confidence, we need a new approach to planning that can articulate the city's vision, inform developers where development will be encouraged and work with them to identify sites—and so speed up the process and reduce uncertainty.

The revised guidance sets out as clearly as possible the importance that we attach to the revitalisation of our city, town and local centres. We are proposing a positive approach to planning, based on a clear strategy about where we will encourage development. That marks a change from the reactive approach that planners have often had to take in relation to a succession of out-of-centre developments. The guidance provides clearer tests for proposals for out-of-centre developments—whether shops, offices, leisure, higher education, health or other uses that attract a lot of people and are best located in, or close to, existing centres. I emphasise that it is a question not just of shops but of those other important developments as well. We expect local planning authorities, after consulting widely, to provide clear guidance on where development will be encouraged in their areas.

As well as that plan-led approach, the guidance advocates a sequential approach to choosing sites, starting with the town centre or other centres, then edge of centre—defined in terms of easy walking distance—and only then, other sites that are well served by a choice of means of transport. Public transport and access will be important if people want to go for that type of answer.

In drawing up development plans and in individual cases, I expect that approach to be followed, with local planning authorities and developers able to demonstrate that they have thoroughly examined more central sites before they look further afield. I shall require that examination to be thorough—not merely a statement that an examination has been made. The guidance recognises that some uses, such as shops selling bulky goods or certain large-scale leisure developments, may be able to establish a need for development that cannot be accommodated in the town centre. In those circumstances, the guidance suggests that they combine with existing out-of-centre facilities and provide improvements to access by public transport.

The main emphasis of our policy is to revitalise town centres by focusing investment and development, to reinforce their economic prosperity. We need to build on their strengths, on the links that exist between businesses, and on the synergy that makes the pay-off of an individual development much more than just its incremental effect. There is a strong economic argument for recapturing the advantages that town centres traditionally had. Town centres are also the focus of our communities—not just economic, but civic and social. The town is also the most accessible place. Developments on the bypass—whether shops, offices, multi-screen cinemas or hospitals—apart from undermining the vitality and viability of existing centres, are often accessible only by car. As such, they are inaccessible to about one third of the population. Town centres, by contrast, are usually accessible to all.

There is, finally, the environmental rationale—our concern about sustainable development. The dispersed pattern that has grown up over the past 50 years has been made possible and been driven by our increased use of the car, which has given us individually greater freedom, but has made us collectively increasingly reliant on it. By locating development back in centres—town centres or local centres—we can also recapture some choice about how we get to the facilities that we need and how we can achieve a range of tasks in a single trip.

Again, I underline the need for a greater variety of uses in existing centres, moving away from the long-term trend of segregation of uses and the creation of large single-use developments. Since the war, that has been one of the matters that has very much divided our cities. We want to re-establish the diversity and mix that makes town centres vibrant.

Above all, we need to make our town centres places where people want to work, visit and live. We need to encourage more housing in our town centres through flats over shops, conversion of redundant offices and mixed-use developments. We need policies that positively enable such developments, rather than rules that prevent them. I expect local planning authorities to have positive policies to help such developments happen.

To revitalise our town and city centres will take more than just planning policies. It will need vision—a shared vision of the local authority, the local private sector and the local community. The guidance that I published today stresses the need for everyone to get together to generate a clear way forward, a strategy and an action plan. For many centres, there will be a need to address issues of traffic and parking, improving the environment and improving the management and maintenance of public spaces to create the confidence that will bring in the development.

Town centres need a clear strategy, and many need positive management. They cannot just drift, as many have done up to now. Town centres have to remain competitive, and, to do so, they need to be better managed. There is no point in protecting town centres by stopping development elsewhere, only to find that town centres cease to be attractive and do not put in an effort because they feel that they do not have competition.

Part of making our town centres more attractive to investors and to people as places where they can work, shop, worship, take their leisure and live is to improve the quality of the environment. The guidance emphasises the need for raising the quality of urban design, urban spaces, car parks, shop-fronts and street furniture.

Access by car and—more particularly—car parking is a key issue in the guidance. We need to cater for visitors arriving by all means of transport. To cater better for town centre shoppers, the guidance recognises that the main gain will come from reallocating existing parking from commuters to the town centre shopper and visitor. Additional provision, even when it is part of a town centre development, needs to be seen as a contribution to the town centre rather than as tied to the individual development. We need to make car parks work for the town centre.

I have left until last reference to shopping, if only to put it into perspective. The guidance is not about a moratorium on out-of-town superstores—as the French and others have recently produced. Shopping is only one, albeit the most high-profile, of our key town centre uses. The same broad principles—the plan-led and sequential approaches—apply to all such developments, not only to shopping. Shopping gets more publicity simply because it is a dynamic industry and it is an activity that we all do.

The guidance, however, spells out in more detail our policy for shopping. The policy of getting new shopping developments into town or local centres wherever possible applies as much to food stores as to non-food stores. No one type of shopping is singled out for special treatment. We have clarified the tests that out-of-town retail developments should meet—in terms of impact on the vitality and viability of existing centres, their accessibility by a choice of means of transport and their impact on overall car use.

The publication of the revised PPG6 is another major step in promoting planning policies that will produce more sustainable patterns of development. It also confirms our commitment to the revitalisation of our town centres, to put the heart back into our high streets. It will help focus investment and development, to capitalise on the advantages of locations that are accessible to all. I know that the policy will be popular with many people across the country. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): That was not a statement—it was an apology. This is the Secretary of State's apology for years of neglect by the Government of Britain's town and city centres. Every hon. Member will know as they walk down any high street that the Government's legacy on town centre policy is obvious to anybody—the empty shops, the lack of amenities and the fear of crime.

The Secretary of State has sole responsibility for the Government's abdication of their role of providing leadership to the private and public sectors in retail and other development. Will he explain to the House why it has taken him so long to publish the proposals? Does he realise that that delay has caused enormous uncertainty? Does he accept that the only reason why retail development looks elsewhere is the Government's failure to make proposals to revitalise town and city centres?

In what way is the Secretary of State proposing to target regeneration funds in support of the renaissance of our town centres? Will he accept responsibility for the appalling time scale in dealing with planning issues? Will he explain to the House why it is he who takes so long to deal with call-ins on retail development, knowing full well that delay causes additional economic burdens and is an unnecessary interference in the diversity of local policy?

Does the Secretary of State not agree that the Government, through legislation, have directly hampered the ability of local councils to support their local town centres? What does he propose to do with the hundreds of extant planning permissions for developments outside town and city centres?

Labour Members are serious about protecting Britain's town and city centres. They are part of our heritage and a vibrant part of our economy. They are our future. Over the years, we in the Labour party have warned time and again that the pursuit of the Government's planning policies would destroy town centres. They have ignored our concern and the pleas of the private and public sectors.

British retailing is among the most sophisticated and technologically advanced in the world. We have witnessed a retail revolution that has obviously passed this Government by. Over the years, there has been tremendous innovation in retailing, which the private sector has ably demonstrated in its evidence to the Labour party's review of planning policy. Never mind about Istanbul; it is Labour councils that have led the way in city centre management. They are initiating impressive schemes, working in partnership with the private sector, and bringing people back into our town centres so that they are vibrant and exciting places in which to live and work and for our children to play in. They are challenging the fortress approach that has been imposed on them over the past 17 years.

Labour in Coventry has innovative car parking schemes, York has its city centre housing policies, Leeds has proposals for a 24-hour city and there is Birmingham's dynamic use of culture and the arts. There is no need for citizens to retreat to the suburbs after dark.

Every town and city centre in Britain is different, but they all have one thing in common. It was interesting to hear what the Secretary of State said about the heart of Britain being our town and city centres. They have been left with a hole in their heart because of the Government's policies. The butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker of middle England, so beloved by the Secretary of State, are being driven away by the twin burdens of economic recession and an absence of Government strategy, including a totally non-existent transport policy. Up and down the country, family businesses with a history spanning generations have closed.

Every town and city centre that has suffered over the past 17 years should erect a suitable monument to the Secretary of State to which the local pigeons have access. It should bear the legend, "He did too little, too late, and when he did something, it was not enough." The Labour party believes in making the high street work, not in letting the high street down, which is what the Government have done.

Mr. Gummer: No one would know from that that almost every one of those cities has a Labour council that has driven out of the centre time and again every shop that tried to make money. Let us talk about Newcastle, where John Lewis used to pay three times as much in rates per square foot as it did in Westminster, because Newcastle city council used to tax people out of the city. Leicester, from which the hon. Gentleman comes, has a notorious city council, pushing businesses out of the city centre into the surrounding county. Fosse park in Blaby district has prospered directly because of the city's appalling attitude to business.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Leeds. That city did not start to think about partnership until the Government forced it to do so because of the Leeds urban development corporation. We had to take over areas of our great cities to rejuvenate them, because of the appalling history of Labour councils that did not care about business, never cared about the city and drove people out into huge soulless estates.

When I appeared before a Select Committee in the other place, one of the questioners was an ex-Labour councillor who was still defending the destruction of the centre of Liverpool by building outside it towns without amenities, without decent public transport and without any of the things that make a town work.

The hon. Gentleman has no right to come to the House and talk about those matters in the way that he did, because we know from reports in The Independent that he is busy telling people that, if there were ever a Labour Government, they would be much softer on out-of-town developers. There has been no direct denial of that. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is precisely why the Opposition had a nice cosy little meeting with various representatives of business whom they thought they could cajole on to their side.

The hon. Gentleman's speech was an attempt to cover up the fact that, from Newcastle in the north right the way down to the great cities of the midlands and the south, where Labour has been in charge, city centres have increasingly died. The new programme that we have now put into operation and the partnership in which we have led the way have driven even the city of Sheffield—with two of its worst leaders now sitting in the House—to join the partnership. The hon. Gentleman should be ashamed of himself and he should support our proposals.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Does my right hon. Friend agree that for anyone who has the remotest remembrance of Labour party policies when it was last in government, the uncharacteristically churlish remarks of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) beggar belief? Will he accept the congratulations of all clear-thinking people on his personal initiative in this whole area and the impetus that he has given to it, which is worthy of the utmost commendation?

Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the problems with encouraging high street shopping is that it demands unpopular decisions, perhaps relating to new bus routes going through streets unaccustomed to such traffic, or the provision of more car parking? If there is to be success in this area and if retail outlets are to return to our high streets, it is absolutely essential that there is the utmost co-operation between local authorities, local traders and local residents.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right. He may have noted that in my statement I made no reference to anything that could not be supported by the Opposition if they had chosen to take a bipartisan approach—such as I have done—rather than the extremist view adopted by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) as a fig leaf to cover up a very sad history. The truth is that we need to ensure that the city centres live—and that costs. We also need to take unpopular decisions, and that is what we have done. I note that the Labour party has even criticised me for calling in some of the developments and thinking about them carefully before making a decision.

Mr. Vaz: The right hon. Gentleman takes too long.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman says that I take too long—that is because he is used to making decisions and speeches without thought.

Mr. Chris Davies (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Does the Secretary of State accept that much in the document should be welcomed by all hon. Members, and that it gives some real substance to the sentiments that he has expressed for some years? The tragedy is that the document should have been published 17 years ago, when some of the Secretary of State's less environmentally conscious predecessors allowed the stable door to be opened, to the great detriment of traders across the country. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, although the document will help in the long term to alter the planning policies that have so changed our towns over the past few years, it is not good enough to think merely of the long term, given the number of developments already in the pipeline for which planning permission has already been granted?

Does the Secretary of State agree that a moratorium should be introduced until developers can demonstrate firmly and convincingly that their projects will not harm the vitality and viability of existing town centres? Does he accept that there are still some unenlightened local authorities that seem to believe that out-of-town developments are beneficial? Does he accept that once such authorities give approval to a development, there is little that retailers can do to prevent it, whatever harm they believe it may do? Does he agree that there should be a simple appeals system, so that the guidelines he now supports can be put into practice by traders?

Where is the money to come from, to pay for some of the town centre improvements described in the document? Surely there is a need for pricing mechanisms to ensure a better balance between the advantages enjoyed by car users at out-of-town developments and the advantages for those using car parks in town centres.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman would do well to note how many planning permissions sought previously have not been proceeded with. I do not think that the problem is as worrying as he makes it out to be. In any case, as he knows well, there are no powers under which a moratorium could be brought about, so that is not a possibility.

I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman about the timing of the document. Much of our retail development has brought about what the hon. Member for Leicester, East, in one of his more sensible moments, called the retail revolution. Many people want to use supermarkets. I have never been opposed to them and, as Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, I often commended the fact that people had wider choice and fresher food in city centres than they had ever had before, and at prices that were extremely competitive. I am not opposed to supermarkets, but I am saying that there should be a reasonable balance. That reasonable balance can be achieved by concentrating now on our town and city centres, and that is what I seek to do.

The hon. Gentleman referred to price incentives. It is difficult to imagine how they would operate. No doubt I shall have the opportunity of seeing a Liberal Democrat working party document which, if I know such documents, will be strong on platitudes but not very good on practicalities.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: I have the remainder of the day's business to safeguard. More than 40 Members seek to speak in the debate that follows. I therefore require hon. Members to put single brisk questions to the Secretary of State and I require the Secretary of State to answer briskly so that we can proceed properly with our business.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North–East): Will the Secretary of State ensure that local planning controls properly reflect the needs of shoppers? Is he aware that retail costs in this country are much higher than those in, for example, the United States? What will his proposals do to reduce the high cost of shopping here?

Mr. Gummer: I shall certainly look at the particular points that my hon. Friend raises. I am sure that he is pleased to see that I have put much emphasis on what local authorities can do to release more land in the centres of cities, to assemble suitable plots and to use their powers to help in exactly the way that my hon. Friend wants.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Secretary of State aware that he should also look at the new gimmick that developers use in coalfield areas in particular? They put in applications for opencast, thereby getting rid of valuable agricultural land, and a planning development comes along later. There is such a development in my constituency, adjoining the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes). An opencast application has been put in, and there will then be an out-of-town shopping development. If the Secretary of State does not ensure that the opencast application is turned down, that valuable land will be almost fit for a set-aside scheme, so the planning application will go through. If he does not do that, the Duke of Devonshire will make a lot of money.

Mr. Gummer: I have not heard such an assembly of prejudices in one question for a long time. The hon. Gentleman must accept that PPG6 makes it quite clear that planning applications for out-of-town shopping centres will not be accepted unless there is no other place for necessary shopping development. That is quite clear, so what he says does not apply.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the joy that his statement will bring to the town centre of Kingston upon Thames, which has been nurtured by Conservative councils over the years? Will also assure me that he will protect historic marketplaces such as that of Kingston upon Thames and ensure that parking charges do not get totally out of hand, thus killing shopping? Will he give us assurances on security and street cleaning?

Mr. Gummer: On street cleaning, Conservative councils are more likely to get the streets cleaned properly, particularly if they contract out the service. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will have words to say about further moves on security. If people live in town centres, that helps security considerably. I have the same affection for historic markets as my hon. Friend, and I am pleased that Kingston has been so well protected by Conservatives in the past, as it will be in future when the present lot gets out.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Does the Secretary of State accept that the Government's conversion is most welcome? It is also welcome that they have accepted so many of the Select Committee's recommendations. However, does he realise that it is rather late for places such as Greater Manchester, where new developments at Cheadle and Dumplington have done a great deal to damage the existing town centre? What does he plan to do to make it possible to convert many of the empty shops in town centres and suburban shopping parades into housing? That excellent proposal needs to be effected, because empty shops make shopping areas depressing.

Mr. Gummer: I agree. That is why we are doing a great deal of work on building regulations, for example, which are different for different types of development. If we can make the whole system more sensible and make it hang together, we shall help to encourage that. We are looking particularly at the problem that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I remind him that, although we responded to the Select Committee, it was because of our moves in that direction and my announcement that the Select Committee decided that the issue was worth examining. Therefore, it is fair to say that the Government have driven the proposal right the way through.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid–Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend realise how much his statement will be welcomed in middle England, particularly in small cathedral cities such as Lichfield? In particular, does he realise that his hierarchy of development—town centre, edge of centre and out of town—and the proactive moves in respect of town councils will be very much welcomed? Will my right hon. Friend explain how he intends to ensure that local councils properly explore the possibilities of development in town centres before it is proposed out of centre?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend must understand that the guidance is the mechanism by which inspectors make their decisions. Local authorities that do not follow the guidance will find that their decisions are overturned and in many cases they may well find themselves carrying the cost of that. Therefore, local authorities will understand precisely what needs to be done. I am working closely with them and in most cases they have had a change of heart. However, it has been very hard in a number of cities. I am pleased to say that even in Sheffield, the new council leader is beginning to think seriously about participation and partnership.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton–Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents will warmly welcome his statement? In particular, a group of traders in Tewkesbury have written to me today to thank my right hon. Friend for overturning his own inspector and making a landmark decision under the new guidelines. Does he accept that the new guidelines are particularly necessary in small and medium-sized historic market towns, not least because large developments are of a disproportionate size to the retail base in those towns? Will he instruct his inspectors rigorously to uphold the guidelines, so that I shall not need to talk to him about some cases that may be building up in future in respect of Cirencester?

Mr. Gummer: My motive for doing that will not be merely to avoid seeing my hon. Friend—but I promise him that not only will I do as he says, but that people who believe that they can get round the rules by renaming their shops and giving them some other sort of title so that it appears that they are not a retail centre, will find themselves caught by exactly the same regulations.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North–East): I welcome the further retreat from Thatcherite dogma, inadequate and late though it be. However, does the Secretary of State accept that the damage done while that dogma prevailed, and while planning applications were being accepted over the heads of local authorities throughout the country, was profound and long-lasting? What on earth can he do now, as he shuts the stable door after the horse has bolted? Are there not hundreds of planning applications, which were approved by his predecessor while he sat on the Government Benches, still outstanding and ready to be developed at the expense of town and city centres throughout the land?

Mr. Gummer: The real problem is something very different. Labour councils in our big cities have destroyed those cities, first by driving business out of them; secondly by stopping private development within them; thirdly by insisting on dividing where people live from where they work; fourthly by insisting that people want to live in tower blocks rather than in small houses side by side; and fifthly by pulling down instead of renovating. There is no history in Britain worse than that of Labour local government and the town centres. The hon. Gentleman has hit exactly the wrong target. It is only because what he refers to as "Thatcherite dogma" recreated the economy that we can do what we are doing now.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): Why does the Secretary of State propose to clog up the centres of towns with car parks and cars, rather than pursuing a policy of regular, cheap, if not free, public transport—the very policy that the Government destroyed in South Yorkshire?

Mr. Gummer: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has ever gone shopping with small children and large numbers of bags. He ought to live in the real world of real people. If we want people, especially women, to shop in city centres, we must provide safe, clear places nearby where they can park their cars, so that they can do their shopping with their children and then get back into their cars and drive. If the hon. Gentleman thinks differently, he has not gone shopping himself. I wonder who in his house does the shopping.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, West): The Secretary of State will be aware that the Merry Hill centre is located in my constituency. I appreciate that he cannot comment on the current planning inquiry, but can he tell the House whether, and if so how, the revised guidance will affect consideration of proposals to extend existing out-of-town developments?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to acknowledge that I cannot refer to the particular case, but in general the position is as follows. I have already said that, if there are to be extensions of out-of-town shopping for one reason or another, it is best if that happens where there is already such a development, and that it should be associated with good public transport and the like. I have made it clear that there is no question of a moratorium on out-of-town shopping, as has taken place in France. We have much to learn from the rest of the continent. If only we had followed more closely some of the good ideas from the rest of Europe, instead of some of the American attitudes, we would have done better.

We accept that there will be some approvals, and I shall examine each case as carefully as I can. But that sometimes takes rather longer than the hon. Member for Leicester, East, with his "quick, tick, tick, tick and out" approach, would want. We want to get the right answer, not simply a quick answer.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I find it hard to recognise the picture that the Secretary of State paints of the responsibility for some of the disasters that have been inflicted on us in the past. In the north-east, our town centres have been seriously damaged by the dreaded Metro centre which, as the Secretary of State knows, was built by Sir John Hall, who is not a Labour voter. May I ask about another point that has been referred to but not answered? How many planning applications have been granted for further out-of-town centres? Can anything be done about them, or is it too late?

Mr. Gummer: The Metro centre was so successful because Newcastle city council pushed up the rates in the centre of Newcastle until nobody could make money there. That was one of the good examples of how Labour local government works, and how a Labour Government would work, if there were one. Labour taxes people until they cannot make money, and then complains because somebody else tries to allow them to make money "offshore"—in this case, just over the boundary in the Metro centre. The hon. Gentleman clearly does not know the history of the area that he has represented for some time. As for the second part of his question, I shall give him an up-to-date figure. What I said to the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Davies), the Liberal Democrat spokesman, applies to the hon. Gentleman's question, too.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Has not this policy U-turn come years too late? It is not only the inner cities that have suffered, but towns such as Tewkesbury, and Barnoldswick in my constituency. Barnoldswick—a town of some 10,000 people—has lost its jobcentre and its gas and electricity showrooms, and the centre of that small town is a wasteland. Business rates have gone sky-high and traders do not know where to turn. Has not the Secretary of State been criminally negligent in the way in which he has allowed our small towns to deteriorate?

Mr. Gummer: First, the rates in the north of England have been significantly and proportionately reduced following the introduction of the uniform business rate. At the time of its introduction, some £800 million moved from the south to the north as a result of Conservative changes after the high rates placed on businesses by Labour local authorities. Such authorities used to take money from businesses—because those businesses did not have enough votes to vote the council down—and spend it on silly schemes that helped no one and were paid for by local people. The hon. Gentleman wants to know why that has happened in the north of England—it is because of Labour councils and Labour rating.

As for the hon. Gentleman's comments on town centres, planning permission arrangements will not make people open shops if they will not be profitable. Town centres will be given as big a chance as possible to compete, but the public want proper competition and decent prices. If they are provided in city centres, the people will go there. If they are not—Labour councils have stopped them in many cities—people will go elsewhere.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley) rose—

Madam Speaker: Mr. Booth, it is my impression that you came in after the statement had started. Is that correct?

Mr. Booth: That is correct, Madam Speaker, and I apologise. As I have a special interest, I was watching my monitor and heard every word from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). Had I come away, I would not have done so.

Madam Speaker: That is a story which I have heard many times before. The entire House knows my attitude—Members must be in the Chamber to hear the statement if they wish to question the Minister.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

4.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I welcome this opportunity to report to the House on matters concerning the forthcoming Florence summit and other matters affecting the European Union. However, I must begin with an apology to the House. As I must accompany the Prime Minister to Florence later this evening, I will have to leave the Chamber just after 6 pm. I hope that the House will understand. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) hopes to reply to the debate and to deal with the matters raised in it.

I also take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on his appointment to the Privy Council, which I believe to be a well-deserved recognition.

One of the advantages of this debate is that we can discuss the forthcoming Florence summit. I want to use part of my remarks to comment on the beef crisis and how the Government see the likely developments during the next few days. Before I do so, I shall refer to some of the other important matters likely to be discussed during the weekend. Clearly there are important issues and we hope that, if the beef problem can be resolved, the EU will be able to address more long-term problems that command attention. I shall highlight three issues briefly.

First, there is to be a report on the intergovernmental conference to the Heads of Government. The conference has now been proceeding for two or three months. As one would expect, the deliberations have been mainly general. It is unlikely that the Heads of Government will be expected to reach even provisional conclusions. We would certainly oppose that. It would clearly be premature, and I do not think that anyone else will take a different view.

However, the Heads of Government might wish to indicate priorities for the conference to look at in the next few months. When Foreign Ministers met in Rome earlier this week, we said that flexibility, defence, employment and third pillar issues might well be deserving of some form of priority.

Employment is another major issue that the conference is likely to consider. We are all conscious that unemployment in Europe is far too high. It is likely that there will be a lively debate based on a number of papers that have been prepared. Certain proposals from President Chirac, and Jacques Santer's own ideas, will determine the nature of the discussion. The United Kingdom will want to point to our experience as the country of western Europe that has relatively low and falling unemployment. We have a much better record in that respect than any other major European economy at the present time.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Rifkind: It is rather early, but I cannot resist my hon. Friend.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To get the facts absolutely straight, as I know that my right hon. and learned Friend always does, will he confirm that, while the European Union has a high rate of unemployment—11 per cent. or 20 million—those countries which voted not to join the European Union have low rates of unemployment and great prosperity?

Mr. Rifkind: I could point to countries both inside and outside the European Union that have either high or low rates of unemployment. I do not draw any general conclusion. The United Kingdom is a good example of how it is possible to have relatively low and falling unemployment, which is a great credit to the policies that have been pursued by the Government.

The great challenge facing Europe at the moment, as we know, is the increased competitiveness of countries in south-east Asia and Latin America. If they increasingly challenge our markets, it is not unreasonable to point out that their success is not as a result of an addiction to the social chapter or to putting treaty amendments on employment in the legislation that covers their affairs, but because those countries have increasingly adopted policies of deregulation, development of a market economy, privatisation, competition and more open trading. That has led to their being powerful challengers. I believe that the United Kingdom can, in a similar way, show the rest of Europe how unemployment can best be dealt with. I am sure that many of the discussions on employment will centre on those aspects.

The third main issue that is likely to be considered is European monetary union. Therefore, the Florence Council will consider reports by the Economic and Finance Council—ECOFIN—the European monetary union progress report on ins and outs, fiscal stability pacts, and the Commission's broad economic guidelines. A substantive report is expected to be presented at the Dublin European Council.

There will also be discussion on a number of other matters, with the possibility of declarations on the middle east, what is happening in Russia and other such issues.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Rifkind: In a moment, but not now.

I should like to report to the House on the situation affecting the beef industry and what I believe is the objective over the next few days, and comment on certain matters of current interest in that respect.

[Mr. Rifkind]

As is well known, the British Government start from exactly the same basis as that of all other European Governments—that the first priority must be the health of the public, combined with the eradication of bovine spongiform encephalopathy. Those are the twin objectives, and we share the determination of all who are involved in the matter to ensure that they are achieved. We know that, against that background, some 160,000 animals have been found to be infected with BSE in the United Kingdom over a number of years. They have all been slaughtered and destroyed.

We know that, because the British Government are determined to deal with higher risk categories, they have implemented for some time a policy of ensuring that all animals over 30 months of age not only are slaughtered when they reach the end of their working life but that their carcases are destroyed to ensure that they do not enter the food chain. Those measures and, in addition to them, the much more sophisticated control mechanisms now in place in the United Kingdom—more than in any other part of Europe—explain the British Government's view that the ban should never have been introduced, that it continues to be unjustified and that British beef is safe to eat. That is not only our view, but the view that Commissioner Fischler, the Agriculture Commissioner, expressed some time ago.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Rifkind: In a few moments, if I may.

It is against that background that we have approached these matters, but we are realistic. We know that, even if we believe that the ban should never have been introduced, we need the agreement of the other member states and the Commission if the ban is to be lifted, so the Government have pursued a strategy since the ban was introduced that is designed to bring about the completion of its ending at the earliest possible date.

Our strategy has been straightforward and simple—to persuade the Commission of the desirability of lifting the ban and, through that means, to persuade other member states. As the House will recall, the first category was beef derivatives—the famous tallow, gelatine and bull semen. The Commission was persuaded. It unanimously recommended the removal of that ban. The House will recall that the proposal was blocked by a minority of member states. They went in—if one wishes to use the phrase—for a policy of non-co-operation. They refused to co-operate with the unanimous view reached by the Commission after it took scientific advice.

Against that background, on 21 May, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House that we did not believe that it was reasonable to accept such an outcome and that the United Kingdom would pursue a policy of non-co-operation until two objectives were fulfilled. The first was the lifting of the ban on beef derivatives. That ban has now been lifted. The second was the agreement of a framework strategy that allowed for the phased lifting of the rest of the ban.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North–East): On the Government's strategy, did the Foreign Secretary hear the Deputy Prime Minister say that this was a battle between Britain and the rest of the world? If he did, and if he agrees with that statement, why are we not implementing a policy of non-co-operation with the entire world?

Mr. Rifkind: As the hon. Gentleman may not be aware of the full facts, let me enlighten him. It is true that the United States has a partial ban on British beef. It is also true that it has the same partial ban on France, Ireland and Portugal, as well as other countries outside the European Union. The EU ban is much wider than that of the United States and other countries, so it is logical and appropriate to deal first with it, and then we shall be able more effectively to deal with any remaining bans that apply against not only the United Kingdom, but France and other European countries.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): A moment ago, the Foreign Secretary said that the Government's objective was to obtain the completion of the lifting of the ban at the earliest possible date. Can he tell the House when, under the framework that he is recommending to the House, the completion of the lifting of the ban will be successfully reached?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman—the right hon. Gentleman, I apologise—knows perfectly well that it is impossible to give calendar dates. He and the Leader of the Opposition knew that perfectly well when, after a certain momentary hesitation, they decided to give their support to the Government's non-co-operation policy.

Mr. Cook rose—

Mr. Rifkind: Let me complete the remark before I again give way.

In the past 48 hours, the right hon. Gentleman has gone through his customary procedure. He solemnly endorsed the Government's non-co-operation policy on the basis laid down by the Prime Minister a month ago to achieve a framework strategy and now, with a sudden presentation of amazement that there is no timetable in the framework document, conveniently forgets that the Government never said that they would propose a timetable. Indeed, the Government have made it clear in the past month that calendar dates would not be introduced. The right hon. Gentleman knows that as well as I do. Perhaps he will put aside his pious and unconvincing indignation before he comments further.

Mr. Cook: The Foreign Secretary can confirm that I wrote to him on 27 May to say that our support was for the lifting of the ban within a defined time scale. I appreciate that the Foreign Secretary cannot offer us a calendar date, but can he tell us which year he will agree to—this year, next year or the year after?

Mr. Rifkind: I will give the information to the right hon. Gentleman in the near future, if he will be patient for a moment longer.

Mr. Leigh: Surely the important answer to the point raised by the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) is that we cannot give calendar dates but—as farmers in my constituency and farmers' leaders said this morning—there must be an automatic phased lifting of the ban as conditions are met, and that that should not be conditional on politicised committees meeting in Brussels. That is the important point that needs to be made. Now the 30-month cull is in place, any further cull must be based on scientific evidence for the purpose of eradication; it should not be just a mass slaughter of healthy cows.

Mr. Rifkind: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. He has summed up the point correctly. Since the Prime Minister announced the policy of non-co-operation, we have pursued the adoption of a framework strategy, but such a strategy must, as my hon. Friend rightly says, be based on objective scientific criteria. We know that the Commission's beef derivatives proposal was blocked by a minority of member states, not on scientific grounds, but for a variety of reasons that related, in part, to the state of public opinion back home, in part to their perception of the constitutional difficulties that they would face in getting the lifting of ban through their parliaments, and in part to other, essentially irrelevant, reasons that had no direct relation to public health. We presented our framework document to the Commission, which has largely used our proposals to produce its document, and we are determined to ensure, as my hon. Friend rightly says, that scientific and objective criteria are applied.

We know that the Commissioners, as individuals, are not scientists, any more than Ministers are scientists. They need advice when scientific matters are being considered and I have no objection to the advisory—I stress advisory—scientific committees to which the Commission will refer such matters in order to be satisfied that the conditions that are laid down in the framework document have been met.

That is why the right hon. Member for Livingston was again talking nonsense when he said yesterday, and the day before, that the framework document required the approval of five scientific committees before anything could happen. He knows that, with the exception of the Standing Veterinary Committee, the other committees are purely advisory. He also knows that only two groups of people—scientists and politicians—can give advice on scientific matters. If I had to choose between the two groups on a scientific matter of fact, I know that one of the objectives of the United Kingdom's policy has been to ensure that the Commission bases its decisions on the scientific advice of those who are responsible to it, rather than relying on ministerial judgments in the other capitals of Europe.

Mr. Gapes: Can the Foreign Secretary confirm that, in addition to the 21 countries that have imposed a ban on British beef for a variety of reasons since 1990, 39 countries had imposed bans on British beef before the European Union decision? Can he give us a guarantee that, if the European Union ban is lifted, all the individual countries will abide by that lifting of the ban—or will they make national decisions?

Mr. Rifkind: For countries outside the European Union, the decisions are obviously national decisions. What is unique about the European Union ban is that we are part of a single market. That is what makes the ban qualitatively different from those of the United States, Canada or any other country. A national Government can, of course, come to a decision—and we can respond against that country by a reciprocal ban if we so choose. Every Government has that right, but we are part of a single market, and a ban imposed on health grounds by 14 countries on the exports of the 15th can be maintained only if those health grounds can be justified and if other considerations are not brought into play.

There is a deep sense of unfairness in the United Kingdom about the ban, because the Commissioner for Agriculture has said that, in his judgment—and he speaks for the Commission—British beef is safe to eat. That means that there is no justification for a breach of the single market principle for reasons not directly related to public health.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): We all want the phased lifting of the ban to happen quickly. I understand that the Commission will be influenced by, one hopes, objective scientific opinion, but when a proper proposal is made by the Commission to lift a segment of the ban, will that have to be approved by the Council of Agriculture Ministers first?

Mr. Rifkind: No, that should not be required. I shall tell the right hon. Gentleman and the House about the procedure that will be followed, because it is spelt out in the framework document. We told the Commission, and it has accepted the point, that it would be sensible to consider the ban not as a single ban, but as a ban on different categories of cattle, including those from BSE-free herds that have been only grass-fed, embryos, young cattle born recently, those under 30 months and those over 30 months. Those are the five categories that the Commission suggested. In each case, the procedure for lifting the ban—and this point relates to the timetable—will begin when the United Kingdom Government present a working paper to the Commission describing the ways in which the conditions for lifting that part of the ban have been met.

For example, in the case of BSE-free herds—those that have been fed only on grass and have no history of infection—we are working at the moment, as the House knows, on a system of certification, which is already advanced in Northern Ireland and will soon be available for the rest of the United Kingdom. When the Ministry of Agriculture is able to do so, it will present the documentation that shows that that system can produce reliable information that a herd is BSE-free. On receipt of that information, the Commission will ask the advisory committees, on an advisory basis, to advise whether the system is sound and working effectively. If the Commission is satisfied, it will adopt a formal proposal that will go to the Standing Veterinary Committee. If the proposal is approved by the Standing Veterinary Committee, the ban will be lifted. It does not need to go before any Ministers or any Government.

Mr. Leigh: Will we have a choice? We fear that the Standing Veterinary Committee is politicised and that it works under the orders of other Governments. It is not a pure scientific body, so we want to ensure that, once we have met the conditions and it is obvious that we have done our best to meet them, the committee will automatically accept the lifting of the ban.

Mr. Rifkind: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns—we have shared concerns because of experience—but he should not take that concern too far. Last night, for example, the Standing Veterinary Committee unanimously approved the United Kingdom eradication programme. That decision, frankly, was far better than we had expected. The committee, including representatives from Germany, Austria and other countries that have been difficult in the past, unanimously endorsed the programme. Even on beef derivatives, with which we have had serious problems, we had a good majority at the Standing Veterinary Committee, although we did not have a large enough majority.

The procedure I have outlined is important, and we have considerably strengthened the system as a result of what has been achieved in the past four weeks. In the past, countries could maintain that questions of market confidence were relevant to perpetuation of the ban. The Commission's framework document clearly states that scientific considerations are relevant, and one of the objectives of the forthcoming foreign summit is that the Heads of Government should also commit themselves to scientific considerations as the basis for decision.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): If the United Kingdom Government feel that they have fulfilled one of the conditions for the lifting of part of the ban, but are turned down by the Standing Veterinary Committee in Brussels, which imposed the ban originally, what will we do?

Mr. Rifkind: I have two points to make in reply to my hon. Friend. First, we would need to judge whether the decision was taken on bona fide scientific grounds. If it was, we would have to consider the committee's concerns carefully. Secondly, as we found in relation to beef derivatives, that is not the end of the matter. Even if the Commission does not achieve a sufficient majority on the Standing Veterinary Committee, it is still able to take the matter forward and, as we saw in the case of the beef derivatives, get the ban lifted. That has already happened. It is not just theory: we saw it happen with the beef derivatives, although it took longer than we had hoped.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Is not the Commission right to insist on a belt-and-braces approach because the Government have been criminally negligent since 1988 in allowing contaminated feed into the system? Is not the root of the problem that the Government did not police the system? The Commission and our European partners recognise that, which is why they insist that everything that is done here should be double-checked by the European Union. Because everything has to be double-checked by our European partners, the Foreign Secretary—like the Prime Minister earlier this afternoon—is unable to tell the House when the ban will, ultimately, be lifted.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is getting a bit carried away. He knows perfectly well that, throughout Europe, there are always imperfections in control mechanisms. If the hon. Gentleman believes ill only of his own country, and that there are no problems in any other country, he is either remarkably naive or extraordinarily short-sighted. Of course we recognise that there have been shortcomings in the United Kingdom's control system—that has been acknowledged for some time—but it is absurd to imply that they are unique to the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman knows—and should recognise—that the control mechanisms now in force in the United Kingdom go far further than those that exist in any other western European country.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) rose—

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen) rose—

Mr. Rifkind: I must make progress—I might give way later.

One matter that I know is of interest to the House is the culling of additional animals, about which there has recently been much publicity. I shall deal with some of the ways in which that subject has been misrepresented in some statements.

We have for some time been slaughtering and destroying all animals over the age of 30 months when they reach the end of their normal working life. Under that policy, 25,000 cattle a week are being slaughtered and destroyed. The Commission proposes that that policy should be accelerated in respect of cattle born in 1989-90—not all cattle, but those that came from herds or areas where they were likely to have been exposed to the same animal feed as animals subsequently found to be infected. We have agreed that that is an acceptable proposal, but that does not mean that there will be any slaughtering of cattle that would not otherwise have been slaughtered and destroyed.

The proposal is that the policy should be brought forward to help produce the earlier eradication of BSE. That factor is not as significant as is being made out in some quarters. We are talking about cattle born in 1989-90—seven-year-old cattle. I am advised that the average age of slaughtered dairy cattle is six years eight months—and it is mostly dairy cattle that we are talking about. A substantial number of the cattle in question would, in normal circumstances—even if it were not for BSE—be reaching the end of their life in the seventh year.

The figure of 67,000, which a number of people have highlighted, is notional. The actual figure is certain to be substantially lower. Of that 67,000, many are cattle that have already been slaughtered or would be coming up for slaughter and destruction during this year under the 30-month scheme. The best estimate that can be made of the additional cattle that might be affected is between 20,000 and 45,000—not 67,000, as previously suggested. Of course, compensation has to be made available to farmers to make up for their loss. It is important that that point is understood; otherwise there could be needless concern and alarm.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Can the Foreign Secretary illuminate that point? He spoke of animals with an average age of six years and seven, or 10, months, which would normally progress into the food chain. Surely the stipulation that, thankfully, is coming from Europe, is that they should not go into the food chain. If they did, pollution across species would occur again and we would greatly damage confidence in our beef.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. Those cattle were already going to be slaughtered and destroyed—but at the end of their normal working life; they would have continued as dairy cattle, producing milk for a longer period. That is perfectly safe and, rightly, no one has objected to that. The cattle would then have been slaughtered and destroyed. They are now going to be slaughtered and destroyed earlier, as that will help with the overall eradication programme. That is an additional factor resulting from the proposal. I am happy to have clarified that point.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: The general public find it puzzling that 40,000 became 80,000 and then 150,000, when the Government maintain at every juncture that they are basing their policy on scientific evidence. How can the science vary so much, especially as 99 per cent. of those cows do not carry the BSE prion? How can the Government claim that the policy is based on scientific evidence? Meanwhile, farmers do not even have a timetable for the lifting of the ban.

Mr. Rifkind: There are two reasons. First, the matter is not arbitrary; we are not talking about all cattle that happen to be born in a particular year. When a cow is found to be infected with BSE, one examines other cows in the cohort that carry a higher risk of potential infection—cattle that would have been born at the same time and, because they were born in the same place, are likely to have been exposed to the same animal feed.

Secondly, we were reluctant to include cattle born in 1989-90 because proper documentation of cattle began only in 1990; before that date, there is no documentation on the age of cattle. The current proposal, which involves taking that year into account, therefore requires the active co-operation of the farming community. Our reluctance sprang from legitimate reasons. In the light of the circumstances, we believe that if there is a proper compensation scheme, the farming community will wish to co-operate and we shall be able to meet the requirement.

I have one further point on the subject, although I do not want to devote my entire speech to beef. The House will have its own view on the necessity or otherwise of the non-co-operation policy. As one who has been very much involved in the policy, I can only give the House my candid judgment: I firmly believe that, without the adoption of the non-co-operation policy four weeks ago, there would not have been the slightest possibility of the Commission adopting a framework document providing for the phased lifting of the beef ban. Nor would there have been the slightest possibility that, at the Florence summit, the Heads of Government might adopt such a policy—as they might do over the next few days. Such is the political controversy surrounding these matters in other countries that they would have found reasons to defer consideration, and it would have taken many more months of uncertainty. Each hon. Member will come to his or her own view on the matter, but I have no doubt that that is the case.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North–East): As the Foreign Secretary knows, I do not agree with the central thrust of what he has said, but if we were to assume that he was right, does he view the United Kingdom's action as a valuable precedent to be followed by this country and by other members of the European Union in similar circumstances in future?

Mr. Rifkind: The crucial aspect of what the hon. and learned Gentleman has just said relates to the phrase "in similar circumstances". The particular point about this sad series of events is that, to my knowledge, it is almost unique for 14 member states to impose a worldwide embargo on the exports of a 15th country. It is not just a matter of Britain disagreeing with the rest of Europe on an aspect of European policy. Of course it would be intolerable to introduce a policy of non-co-operation in such circumstances.

This was unique. We are talking about an important British industry, which had its exports banned by the other 14 countries. How would France, Germany or the other countries have reacted in similar circumstances? Is the hon. and learned Gentleman seriously suggesting that if the French Government, for example, had had their exports banned by the other 14, even though the Commission had said that their beef was safe to eat, would simply have said, "That's very sad. We'll wait until you all change your mind"?

Mr. Campbell: The issue is one of principle. Is the Foreign Secretary saying that it is legitimate to use duress in the current circumstances? If so, is he telling the House that, in other circumstances, he would regard it as legitimate for other countries in the European Union to use duress? Would not the United Kingdom resist any effort to make us negotiate under duress?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. and learned Gentleman must remember what our objective has been: to get a framework agreed by everyone. We have not said, "You must accept our views as to the content of the policy," or, "You must agree that the ban is lifted on 2 July." That might have been unreasonable for the reasons that the hon. and learned Gentleman suggested. We have said that the non-co-operation policy will continue until a framework strategy is agreed by everyone. Our objective was to set a negotiation in train.

Although the Commission was very willing for that to happen, the sad fact, which the House cannot ignore, is that a minority of member states did not want, for reasons of domestic political problems, to start a negotiation, never mind reach an agreement. They wanted the issue to be put in the "too difficult" tray, and perhaps return six or nine months later when their own domestic opinion might have made it possible for them to start to negotiate. That was the problem that we had to address, and we make no apologies for the way in which we dealt with it.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Somerton and Frome): Do not the Opposition, on any attempt to fight our corner in Europe, raise serious questions about what would happen if a Labour Government were elected in this country? Would they agree to everything that was put on the table by our partners in Brussels?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend raises an important point, because the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and the Leader of the Opposition tried, I presume, to earn political capital—as they saw it at the time—by supporting our non-co-operation policy. Now, they attack us because we may be about to accept an agreement that they say falls short of what should be accepted.

Given that the right hon. Member for Livingston supports the non-co-operation policy, I look forward to hearing whether, if he were in our position, he would continue that policy until the various criticisms that he now makes were satisfied. If he is not saying that, he is slightly unconvincing in the strictures that he tries to present. He knows perfectly well the basis on which the non-co-operation policy was introduced: to achieve the lifting of the ban on beef derivatives—which we have achieved—and a framework strategy for the phased lifting of the rest of the ban, which may be achieved in the next couple of days.

Mr. Robin Cook: As the Foreign Secretary was kind enough to refer to me again, perhaps he will now answer the question that he promised earlier that he would: in what year will the completion of the phased lifting of the ban take place?

Mr. Rifkind: As was indicated earlier, we believe that the Ministry of Agriculture will be able to introduce proposals for the initial lifting of the ban in the autumn of this year. It may be earlier. We cannot be certain of the precise date. The lifting of the ban will be a priority for the Government. It will be based on when the Government are able to show the Commission that the conditions have been met. I believe that that process will accelerate over the next few months and that it is a perfectly realistic expectation.

Mr. MacShane: If the Foreign Secretary thinks that he has won on this matter, I imagine that the Dutch football manager went home the other night thinking that he had won.

Let us be clear. Is the Foreign Secretary saying that the Commission is batting for Britain but that member states are exercising an individual veto? As he is Mr. Veto on so many other issues, why does he object so strongly when other countries imitate him?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman thinks that he is making a clever point, but he makes a poor one. The United Kingdom believes that unanimity should often be the requirement. If there had been a need for unanimity in this area, there would not have been a ban in the first place. It was possible to introduce the ban only because of majority voting. Those who live by majority voting occasionally die by majority voting, so that principle should not alarm the hon. Gentleman too much.

I shall now deal with the wider issues. I am conscious of the fact that, recently, there has been heightened interest in the future of the European Union and the United Kingdom's role in it. The position was explained clearly by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in an important speech yesterday. Our commitment to the European Union is based on two fundamental considerations, the first being the political benefits to the United Kingdom, which were best explained by my noble Friend Baroness Thatcher in 1975.

What she said is as true now as it was then. She said that we must ensure that no effort is spared in telling people the basic reason why it is in Britain's interest to remain a member of the European Community, that the Community gives us peace and security in a free society, a peace and security denied to the past two generations, that the Community gives us a chance to influence world affairs, that Britain's instincts have never been isolationist, and that membership of the Community enables us to play a full part in the counsels of Europe and a continuing role in world affairs.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): Is my right hon. and learned Friend absolutely sure that those are still the views of our noble Friend?

Mr. Rifkind: That is an entirely fair question. All I can say is that my noble Friend Baroness Thatcher has never been reluctant to let her views be known on any given matter. If those remarks now misrepresent her current opinion, I am sure that she will take the earliest opportunity to say so. Sadly, she has not done so in the past 20 years, so I am entitled to assume that she holds them as fervently and enthusiastically today as she did then.

The other reason why the European Union is crucial to this country is the single market, which we must not confuse with a free trade area, as occasionally is done. The whole point about the single market is the elimination not just of tariff barriers but of non-tariff barriers, and to deal with the inevitable protectionist tendencies in member states in the European Union. That is why we need the enforcement measures. That is why—despite the criticisms that we often hear about it—there needs to be a European Court—[Interruption.] There needs to be one. To ensure the enforcement of the single market, that is a requirement. That is well understood. It does not in any way diminish some of the criticisms that we make about certain aspects of the way in which the court is permitted to operate, but that is a separate matter.

Mr. Robinson: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that 40 per cent. of all American investment that comes into Europe comes to the United Kingdom because we have the most favourable regulatory regime of any country in Europe, and that that is why we need to use the European Court in these circumstances to improve the single market?

Mr. Rifkind: That is indeed right. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said earlier today, when he quoted the head of the German confederation of industry, 10 times as much investment comes to the United Kingdom as comes to Germany—because of the economic circumstances in this country.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: Although it is certain that we need a court to have a rules-based single market, and we need adjudications on those rules, is it necessary to have a legal system that is superior to our own, and which penetrates our legal system, giving rights and obligations to individuals and institutions within the member states, which is quite unlike any other free market agreement between nation states in any other part of the world, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement?

Mr. Rifkind: It is more than a free trade agreement. It goes back to the origins of the treaty of Rome. It is not some new, sinister development. It has nothing to do with the treaty of Maastricht. It was in the original treaty that we signed some 20 years ago. That point must be remembered.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid–Sussex): My right hon. and learned Friend rightly drew a distinction between a free trade area and a single market, but does he agree that there is a link between a European single market and European monetary union? Monetary union can be seen as a logical consequence of a single market, and it is very difficult for a single market to be achieved without a single currency.

Mr. Rifkind: I am afraid that I must part company with my right hon. Friend. In a recent speech, the Governor of the Bank of England also indicated that he was unconvinced of the existence of a necessary connection between the two elements.

The Government's position on our commitment is clear, but the Leader of the Opposition is in danger of confusing—to say the least—people both here and abroad about what his actual beliefs are. I read with interest a speech that he made recently to the German confederation of industry in Hamburg. Some time ago, he said proudly that, under his leadership, he would never allow this country to be isolated or left behind in Europe. In Germany earlier this week, he said:

"I shall defend the interests of the British people as stubbornly and fiercely as I expect the German government to defend the German interests."

We shall all wait with considerable scepticism to discover how it is possible to reconcile never being isolated with stubbornly and fiercely defending British interests.

Some time ago, we heard the Leader of the Opposition say that, under his leadership, Britain would abandon the veto in regional, industrial, social and employment policy. In Germany, he said that the Conservative party would portray Labour as wanting to end the British veto. Why can we not have a straight line from the Leader of the Opposition? He said in Germany:

"We will be part of the European Social Chapter".

In the very same speech, however, he said:

"The impact of non-wage costs on total employment costs cannot be ignored, nor can the way some regulations prevent the kind of workforce flexibility needed by modern manufacturing processes and the new service industries."

As in so many other areas of policy, the Leader of the Opposition says all things to all people in a desperate attempt to promote his own position.

I believe that the situation in the Labour party is beginning to resist that approach. Only this week, in the European Parliament, 52 Labour MEPs rejected the Labour policy of support for non-co-operation. In doing so, they attacked not just the Government but their own leadership. Very recently, a document was published, signed by 50 Labour Members of Parliament who were attacking their own Front Bench on the single currency, and who say that they are going to launch a campaign to persuade their own party leadership to change its current policy of being sympathetic to the idea.

Those inconsistencies, with Labour MEPs attacking their Front Bench and 50 Members of Parliament criticising official policy—well, it all looks quite familiar. The hon. Member for Livingston is going to begin to experience what some of us have been experiencing for a little longer. We have always known that these divisions exist in the Labour party, but until recently Labour Members have been slightly better than us at concealing them. It is now evident that that deception cannot be sustained. The extraordinary, unprecedented self-discipline is breaking down, and I have no doubt that that will add to the gaiety of mankind.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I must announce that Madam Speaker has decided that, from 7 pm, speeches shall be restricted to 10 minutes.

5.23 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I shall follow the Foreign Secretary in addressing the bulk of my remarks to the beef dispute and its resolution, but before I do so, let me also follow his example in referring to another matter that will arise at the Florence summit. I hope that it will prompt concern on both sides of the House, and possibly on all sides of the Tory party.

In the past two weeks, the Foreign Secretary has twice attended Council meetings at which the peace process in Bosnia has been discussed, and he will know that that is also on the Florence agenda. This may well be the House's last opportunity to raise concerns about the peace process before the House rises for the recess, and it is likely that Bosnia will proceed to elections while it is in recess. I suspect that the Minister of State will have a lot on his plate when he replies to the debate, but when he does so, will he give us the Government's current views on whether it will be feasible to hold fair and free elections in Bosnia by 14 September, and tell us what view the Prime Minister will express at the Florence summit when the matter is discussed?

The Minister will be aware that there are serious doubts about whether the elections can be free and fair. For instance, are the Government satisfied that candidates outside the governing parties will have access to independent media? What happened to the television station, promised during the Dayton peace process, that would give access to people outside the state apparatus? Are the Government satisfied with progress on the return of refugees? I understand that 1,950,000 out of a total of 2 million have still not returned. Can they realistically take part in the elections in September?

Finally, and perhaps most important, what more can the Government offer to bring Mr. Karadzic and General Mladic to justice before the international war tribunal? Even if they do not stand in the elections, their continuing presence intimidates others, and there can be no reconciliation after the atrocities of the war if no justice is brought to bear on those responsible for those atrocities. I would be grateful if the Minister could tell us what view the Government will express in Florence; and I thank the House for its patience in allowing me to refer to the peace process that is intended to resolve the war in Bosnia.

On the more absorbing issue of the resolution of our beef war with Brussels, I am quite confident—more confident than the Prime Minister sounded at Question Time—that the issue will be resolved in Florence. It is evident that the Government will now accept anything that is on offer to get themselves off the hook on which they have impaled themselves. We can see that if we examine the deal that is now on offer from Brussels, and compare it with the deal sought by Britain.

[Mr. Robin Cook]

First, there is the matter of the extra cull to which the Foreign Secretary referred, and to which he put a figure of between 20,000 and 45,000—or, as the Deputy Prime Minister described it this morning on the "Today" programme, a "handful" of cattle. The Foreign Secretary tried to explain that this was not an extra cull at all, because the cows were going to be killed anyway.

Perhaps the House will allow me a reminiscence. I once took an English companion to the scene of the battle of Flodden, and waxed woeful over the number of members of the Scottish nobility who had died in that battle. My English companion, who was obviously losing patience with my tale of woe, broke in to say, "Well, they would all be dead now anyway." The Foreign Secretary seems to be following the same logic.

The fact is that the Government have no commitment to cull cows aged over 30 months. As the Foreign Secretary rightly said, they have a commitment not to allow cows aged over 30 months to enter the food chain. They have now conceded that cows born in 1989 will be culled before the farmers necessarily conclude that they have reached the end of their working lives. If the Foreign Secretary is really confident that all those cows are at the end of their working lives anyway, he should try explaining to the House why the National Farmers Union is so concerned about the fact that cows on many farms which are not regarded as being at the end of their working lives will have to be culled earlier.

There is also the awkward matter of what the Government said at the time when they embarked on the beef war. On 21 May, the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said:

"I have seen no evidence to justify going beyond the proposal that we have advanced."—[Official Report, 12 May 1996; Vol.278, c.113.]

Yesterday, the Minister said that it was quite untrue that the Government were contemplating an extra cull.

I must tell the Foreign Secretary that there may be a case for the additional culls that are proposed. That is a matter for the House to resolve when it debates the Statutory Instrument which will, of course, be required, although this is not actually an extra cull. But as this Foreign Office debate is focusing on the negotiation of a package, let us at least not pretend that the Government have not shifted their position. Let us at least treat the House as adults and admit that there has been a climb-down, or possibly a climb up. Originally, the Government were willing to cull 40,000. That rose to 80,000 and it is now, according to the Foreign Secretary, about 125,000. That may have been necessary to reach agreement, but let us not pretend that it was not a shift in the Government's position.

I advise the Foreign Secretary not to pretend that the Commission's framework is what the Government wanted. We know that it is not, because it opens by criticising the Government and expressing "considerable misgiving about the effectiveness of past actions taken by the UK in relation to BSE."

It is not the first time that a Foreign Secretary has come to the House and claimed success in his negotiating policy, having secured a document that criticises the effectiveness of his own Government.

We also know that this is not the document that the Government wanted, because we have a copy of the draft framework that the Government were arguing for only last week. There are three major gulfs between the Commission document and the Government paper. The first is that the Government paper sets out at great length the link between the steps that we can take to tackle BSE and the action that the Commission can take to phase out the ban on British beef. There is sheet after sheet on that—five pages in the annexe. Britain's action is in the left-hand column and the Commission's action is in the right-hand column, but none of that is in the Commission document.

Mr. Rifkind: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman clearly has not read the Commission's paper, page 3 of which is about the procedure for lifting the ban. It says:

"A working paper must be presented by the UK, elaborating the specific criteria and indicators as exemplified in the UK framework document", which the right hon. Gentleman quotes. Page 1 of the Commission paper says:

"The Standing Veterinary Committee has examined the UK framework document . . . giving many of the principles a favourable reaction", so the right hon. Gentleman could at least do the House the courtesy of reading the document before commenting on it.

Mr. Cook: I have read the document repeatedly. As the Foreign Secretary says, it states that the committee has given not the five pages of the annexe. The Commission has covered itself by rolling together what is in the annexe into a single paragraph, and by rolling into a separate paragraph what action it might take in lifting the ban. There is no explicit link or parallel there.

"many of the principles a favourable reaction"—

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman must read the document a fourth time if he has read it three times, because he has not understood it. It states clearly the procedure for lifting the ban and says explicitly what the first step is:

"A working paper must be presented by the UK, elaborating the specific criteria and indicators exemplified in the UK framework document."

That is precisely the link that the right hon. Gentleman says does not exist.

Mr. Cook: As the Foreign Secretary says, the document states:

"as exemplified in the UK framework document."

If he regards that as the binding link, I would not go to him for legal advice, even though he may be a Queen's Counsel.

As the Foreign Secretary has turned to the page on procedure, let us deal with his comments. He said that I was wrong in saying that this matter had to go before five committees. [Interruption.] I am sorry if I misunderstood him. Obviously I was right in saying that it had to go before five committees. Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman can check the record. I said explicitly that all these committees bar one were merely advisory committees. They could not block or decide anything. They merely advise the Commission. Only the Standing Veterinary Committee takes a decision.

Mr. Cook: The paper says that the UK working paper "will be submitted"—

Mr. Rifkind: For consultation.

Mr. Cook: Indeed. I intend to read it all, if the Foreign Secretary will relax and let me do so. The paper states:

"This working paper will be submitted for consultation to the Scientific Veterinary Committee, the newly created Multi-disciplinary Scientific Committee and, where appropriate, to other relevant Scientific Committees. At the same time, it will be discussed by the Standing Veterinary Committee.

In the light of these discussions the Commission will take a decision".

Is the Foreign Secretary saying that if, after those discussions, the committees say, "This is not sufficient", and if the Committee expresses the view that the indicators or criteria are not adequate, the Commission will take a favourable decision? Does any Back-Bench Conservative Member believe that that will happen?

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman must not get into a bogus lather about these matters. He knows that the Commissioners are not scientists. He would be the first to criticise Ministers or the Commission if they took scientific decisions without consulting scientific advisers. That is what they are required to do and that is what we insisted on, because if decisions are not based on scientific advice, the only alternative is to base them on political considerations, which is exactly what we are trying to get away from.

Mr. Cook: The Foreign Secretary's intervention was revealing. He said that the Commissioners are not scientists—which we accept entirely—that they will take advice from scientific committees, and that these are the scientific committees. Having listened to that, it is unlikely that the Commission will then say, if the scientific advice is negative, that it will go ahead with the decision.

The next stage is that the Commission will present its draft decision to the Standing Veterinary Committee. As the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) rightly reminded the Foreign Secretary, the Committee refused to lift the ban on derivatives—it divided on it. That is how we got into the dispute and into the non-co-operation policy in the first place.

It is not entirely honest of the Foreign Secretary to say to the House that this will be a matter simply for scientific and not political judgment. The next paragraph says:

"Fortnightly reports by the UK . . . and monthly reports by the Commission to the Council and Parliament will continue as long as necessary and are an integral part of this procedure."

If we assume that the Council is going merely to note the reports with which it feels unhappiest, the Foreign Secretary is not being frank with the House about the nature of the discussions that he has had in the past month.

There is another gulf that the Foreign Secretary cannot wriggle out of. In the document that he submitted last week, the Government made considerable play of the importance of exports to third countries. The Government proposed that exports to third countries that were not authorised to re-export beef to the European Union should recommence immediately. The Government also proposed that exports to other third countries should recommence subject only to safeguards on re-exports to the European Union, not subject to anything that we were going to do to tackle BSE. The Foreign Secretary cannot deny that that is knocked firmly on the head by the Commission, which dismisses the proposal in one line. It says:

"Exports to third countries will be permitted in parallel to phased exports to other Member States".

In other words, until we fulfil all the steps set out by the Commission, and until all the committees give their scientific advice, there will be no exports to third countries.

When he was asked yesterday when exports to third countries could recommence, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with the characteristic honesty that has undermined his interventions in this affair, said:

"I am not trying to avoid it. I just don't know the answer".

Perhaps the Foreign Secretary will give us the answer.

Mr. Rifkind: On exports to third countries, the matter will no doubt be discussed this weekend in Florence. Yesterday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General put to the European Court of Justice the UK case—which was extremely well received—with regard to this part of the ban. We are likely to have a decision within the next week or 10 days on whether there should be an interim decision by the court which could lift that part of the ban immediately. Obviously, we cannot be certain until we hear that judgment, but the Attorney-General believes that he had a good hearing on the inequity of that aspect of the ban. We will wish to see the outcome of that hearing and take that into account.

Mr. Cook: I commend the Foreign Secretary on his confidence in the European Court of Justice. I presume that he will now defend it against the criticism that it frequently receives from Conservative Back Benchers. In case hon. Members did not notice it, may I point out that they are being asked to accept the framework agreement without any commitment on exports to third countries, and on the assumption that the European Court will ride to the rescue, which many Conservative Members will find uncomfortable.

Apart from the gulf between the papers of last week and this week, the Foreign Secretary is unable to answer the question that I repeatedly asked him: when will the phased lifting of the beef ban be completed? He said that it was never his intention to have a timetable. On 27 May, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he was seeking an agreed strategy to provide for the lifting of the rest of the ban and that the question of a timetable would obviously be part of those discussions—so presumably he discussed a timetable with our partners in the European Union. What did they say?

Mr. Leigh rose—

Mr. Cook: I will just finish with the Foreign Secretary.

What did our European partners say when the right hon. and learned Gentleman raised the timetable? Are we to infer from his inability to offer any timetable that he does not wish to share with us the answer that he received?

[Mr. Cook]

Farmers need to know when they can export beef again—will it be this year, next year or the year after? It must be dawning on Conservative Members, including the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle, that they will be fighting the next general election with most of the beef ban still in place.

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman quoted from the British document that was put to the Commission, in which we made no suggestion of determining calendar dates now, as to when various parts of the ban should be lifted. Picking an arbitrary date of 31 July or 2 August would be nonsense. The Commission's document as well as our own reflects that the approach should be to agree the conditions that must be satisfied for the lifting of each phase of the ban, and for the UK to initiate that process when it can demonstrate that those conditions have been met. Then the ban will be lifted.

Mr. Cook: The Foreign Secretary confirms the extent to which the Government are shifting their position. The Minister of Agriculture told the House:

"I made it clear that, in order to be acceptable to us, any Council conclusions must include either agreement to lift the ban forthwith, or a procedure and timetable to that end."—[Official Report, 3 April 1996; Vol. 275, c. 407.]

I ask not for a calendar date but to be told in which year the ban will be lifted—or to extend the point, in which century.

Mr. Leigh: There is no use the right hon. Gentleman answering a question from my right hon. and learned Friend with another question. How can the UK insist in Florence this weekend on any date for the phased lifting of the ban when we have no idea whether the conditions will have been met by that time?

Mr. Cook: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman has been for the past 17 years, or for the past 10 years of the BSE crisis, but a Conservative Government have been in charge all that time. Ten years after BSE appeared in the herd, the Government still cannot say when the conditions for eradicating BSE will be in place. That is why the Commission started its statement by criticising the effectiveness of the UK measures.

The Foreign Secretary asked whether I believe that the non-co-operation policy should continue beyond Florence. I recognise that the job of Foreign Secretary may occasionally involve telling the House with weary resignation, "This is the best deal that I can get, it's the best deal you're going to get, and you'd better take it." There is nothing dishonourable about doing that. I suspect that the Foreign Secretary ought to be saying that to the House.

However, he cannot get away with pretending that this deal is the one that he wanted. Still less can he get away with pretending that the deal is a triumph for the policy of non-co-operation. I am rather more impressed by the results of the freelance policy of non-co-operation pursued by the hon. Members for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst)—who at least succeeded in getting the ban on their hospital lifted. Possibly the Foreign Secretary should have copied their framework strategy.

The Foreign Secretary has been able to secure an agreement because the Government have at last come up with a plan to eradicate BSE from the herd. The right hon. and learned Gentleman carried around that document in his briefcase to all the chancelleries of Europe—an onerous task, and it would be churlish not to congratulate him on the energy that he expended on it. However, why did the Government wait three months after the ban before the Foreign Secretary took that action?

Instead, the Government announced to the House three months ago the possible link between BSE and Creutzfeldt-Jacob disease. There was no warning to Brussels of the thunderbolt coming out of the sky, no plans for the extra measures necessary to tackle BSE or contain the inevitable blow to consumer confidence, and apparently no foreign strategy to contain the entirely predictable reaction of nations that import British beef. If the Government had not made those elementary errors, we might have got the deal that the Foreign Secretary is commending to the House today without three months' delay and the need to disrupt the business of the European Union.

The Foreign Secretary was good enough to refer to our support for the policy of non-co-operation, although not with the generosity appropriate to my attempt to develop a bipartisan line. We argued that that policy should not be applied in a mindless, routine way as a blanket ban, but that there should be sensible exemptions. We said that Britain should not block measures that we wanted more than our partners, or those that affected third countries that are not even members of the EU or parties to the dispute.

The Government blocked both types of measures. They blocked a measure to cut red tape although Britain had proposed it. The Government blocked tougher powers of inspection against fraud although Britain had lobbied for them. I discovered at the weekend that the Government also blocked a letter to Iran about Salman Rushdie, although the only beneficiary would be a resident of Britain and of nowhere else.

One consequence of the non-co-operation policy that the Euro-sceptics could not possibly have anticipated is that it has focused on how many sensible things Europe does and how often they are helpful to Britain. The Government also blocked measures that are more important to the inhabitants of third countries outside Europe than to any resident of Europe. Most spectacularly, the Government blocked a declaration condemning the detention of pro-democracy activists in Burma. I cannot conceive what possible leverage the Foreign Secretary could imagine he was obtaining in respect of the beef ban by offering comfort to the repressive military regime in charge in Burma.

It is now possible to draw up a score sheet on the beef crisis. On the one hand, we have the three-page offer from the Commission that falls far short of the offer that the Government were seeking only last week. On the other hand, we have the casualties. The Government have sacrificed their credibility by blocking measures for which they have long lobbied in Brussels. The Government have left the rest of the world perplexed, having negotiated agreements with Britain's support only to find them blocked by Britain. Most perversely of all for Back Benchers, the Government have left other EU member states more determined than ever before to cut the areas in which the veto applies. The Government's position at the forthcoming intergovernmental conference is to oppose any shift from the use of the veto in European Union decision-making. Their policy of non-co-operation has sharply undermined the credibility with which Britain can argue for that at the IGC.

Another consequence of the Government's behaviour of the past month is potentially damaging to our long-term interests.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Hon. Members: He has only just come into the Chamber.

Mr. Cook: I am tempted to rely on the Speaker's ruling that an hon. Member who is not present for the start of a debate is not allowed to participate half-way through. However, the hon. Gentleman has only a few months left in which to intervene in the House, so I shall not deny him this opportunity.

Mr. Arnold: The right hon. Gentleman is rubbishing the policy of non-co-operation. Was it not the leader of the Labour party who said that he supported precisely that policy?

Mr. Cook: I really should have known better than to let the hon. Gentleman intervene. We have been dealing with this issue for the past 45 minutes, and our position was made perfectly plain at the outset—that we were not going to undermine the Government's activities. We have made very sensible criticisms as to how they should carry out their policy, but the entire thrust of my speech—which I invite the hon. Gentleman to read tomorrow when he gets Hansard—is to point out that the tatty deal that the Government have secured can in no way be represented as a triumph for that policy.

Mr. Arnold: The right hon. Gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman never asks a question that is worthy of answer, to be perfectly frank.

In his remarks, the Foreign Secretary stressed that Britain's future lies in Europe, and ended by praising the achievements of the European Union. If that is his position, the Foreign Secretary must take account of the wave of jingoism and offensive hostility to our European partners that has been released by the Government's activities over the past month, particularly from those newspapers that told us that the Government had declared war in Europe and that told us—presumably with some spinning—that the Foreign Secretary was presiding over a war Cabinet.

The problem is that wars require an enemy. Inevitably those newspapers that announced that we are at war started to write about the other countries of Europe as our enemies. The Sun offered helpful advice to its readers on how best to insult German tourists. Last week, the Foreign Secretary made a speech in which he declared that the Government are not anti-European. I welcome that statement, although I am bound to say that I find it revealing that the Foreign Secretary should feel obliged to have to announce that. I also find it revealing that broadcasting authorities should regard the announcement as sufficiently newsworthy to include in their bulletins.

If the Government are not anti-European, perhaps the Foreign Secretary should tell the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, who—of all people—said it was unbelievable that the BBC had adopted Beethoven's "Ode to Joy" as a theme, because it was a German tune. Perhaps he should also tell the chairman of the Tory party, who—in a pithy statement of his cultural tastes—said that he would have preferred the BBC to choose a "bit of British music". Perhaps the Foreign Secretary should also tell the editor of The Sun.

The Foreign Secretary wrote an article on the beef war for The Sun, which was carried under a cartoon of a German U-boat sinking British ships. In the line immediately above the photograph of the Foreign Secretary, the German U-boat commander says:

"Mein Gott, it's good to be torpedoing British ships again!"

The Foreign Secretary will be aware that I wrote to him to invite him to join me in a joint appeal against that type of offensive xenophobia. He will know that he refused. There is no point in assuring our partners that the Government are not anti-European if they see that that is the type of company that he keeps. It is a short-sighted diplomacy that says one thing to our partners and then sends out a different signal to the editor of The Sun, because the other members of the European Union can see through that.

Mr. Rifkind: I seem to remember that the Leader of the Opposition had an article in his name published in The Sun recently. Will the right hon. Gentleman dissociate himself from that?

Mr. Cook: No, not in the slightest. But I must say that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has dissociated himself from that cartoon and the like. Will the Foreign Secretary now dissociate himself from what The Sun has said?

Mr. Rifkind: I have no difficulty whatsoever in condemning unreservedly the xenophobic nonsense that appears in the tabloid newspapers. But the idea that the Leader of the Opposition can have articles published in The Sun and that I am not allowed to do so without being associated with other headlines in that newspaper is one of the more absurd propositions made by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Cook: The Foreign Secretary cannot wriggle out that way. The reason why The Sun ran that type of cartoon and others like it is that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Government led them—through the spinning on this beef war—to talk about it as a war, to talk about a war Cabinet and to regard the other countries of Europe as our enemies. The Foreign Secretary knows perfectly well that the reason why he did not agree to make that joint declaration against xenophobia is that he did not want to offend the editor of The Sun.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is my right hon. Friend at all surprised at the Tories' indifference to what has been printed in The Sun, bearing in mind the disgraceful speech by the Secretary of State for Defence at the most recent Tory party conference? Should we not also bear in mind when considering this offensive, anti-German hatred that the first victims of the Nazis were Germans? We should always remember that fact when people try to start with their anti-German propaganda.

Mr. Cook: I agree with my hon. Friend. Euro-sceptics who argue that we should withdraw from Europe because Germany is too dominant inside Europe should reflect on exactly how dominant Germany would be inside Europe if Britain was not a part of it.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): As we have a free press and a free democracy, obviously we should not go over the top on such matters. However, bearing in mind that some hon. Members of all parties, including Labour Members, have been researching and comparing the use of words in Nazi newspapers in the early 1930s, when they were Jew-baiting, and bearing in mind what The Sun said in its attacks on Germans, does the right hon. Gentleman feel that there might be—I put it no higher—a case for the Attorney-General to consider prosecutions against The Sun for incitement to racial hatred?

Mr. Cook: I am not legally qualified to express a view on whether such a case could be brought on prima facie grounds. I am, however, politically qualified to know that that type of damaging xenophobia and jingoism deeply undermines Britain's political future—which is inside Europe and in co-operation with Germany and the other European states, not in confrontation with them.

Mr. Jenkin: I join the right hon. Gentleman in condemning that type of xenophobia. But as he continues to advocate more qualified majority voting, will he reflect on the fact that that he is advocating a policy that is likely to give rise to more frustration, more headlines and more misuse of language of that type? We want nations in co-operation, and not to be coerced.

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman—if I understood him rightly—accuses me of hypocrisy. But there is no worse hypocrisy than pretending that the decisions of the European Union—in which the Foreign Secretary participates and in which the Government often take an initiating part—can be characterised by that cartoon and those like it. That is the greatest hypocrisy of all.

Sir Peter Tapsell rose—

Mr. Cook: I must make progress, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me. I have been generous in giving way.

If anyone doubts the harm that is done to Britain's interests by that type of jingoism and offensive hostility, they should listen to the chorus of dismay from business leaders, including the retiring chairman of the Confederation of British Industry, who asked whether, among all this xenophobia, some people had actually noticed that the last war was over. The reality is that millions of jobs depend on exports to the European Union. Withdrawal, as the CBI warned, would leave us with exports that were subject to "regulation without representation".

Hundreds of thousands of jobs in Britain are dependent on inward investment, which comes here only because we have access to Europe—the largest market in the world. Last week, yet another senior business man in the CBI reported that his Japanese company has called several times from Tokyo to ask about Britain's commitment to Europe. The doubts spread by Conservative Members about our commitment to Europe are potentially deeply damaging to the jobs in those companies.

We now have the opportunity to turn the page and to start a new chapter in our relations with Europe. It looks as if we are at the closing stages of the beef war; it will not need the skills of Richard Holbrooke or Henry Kissinger to bridge the outstanding points of difference before the weekend. The Foreign Secretary and his Ministers are quite up to that task—[Interruption.] I am giving the Foreign Secretary the benefit of the doubt for once. He should accept it in the spirit in which it is offered.

It is important that we resolve this dispute, but it is equally important to draw a line under this episode and look to the future. Britain must have a fresh start in Europe, and I do not believe for one minute that the Government are now capable of offering that fresh start. First, the other leaders of Europe will not find it credible when a Government who have pursued confrontation for the past month turn up next week asking for co-operation. Secondly, I see no sign that the Tory Back Benchers will allow them to replace an approach of conflict with an approach based on co-operation.

As I have turned on my television set over the past month, I have never seen the hon. Members for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) or for Stafford (Mr. Cash) looking more fulfilled than when they were at war with Europe. Living in peace with Europe will be the problem for them. The Foreign Secretary's problem is that it is impossible for him to offer a fresh start for Britain in Europe, because too many of his party want a fresh start out of Europe. If in dark moments, when the lights are out, the Foreign Secretary thinks that he has problems with his existing Back Benchers, he should look over his shoulder at the candidates who have been selected for the plum seats in the next election.

The Prime Minister's speech is always an accurate weather vane as to which way the latest wind is blowing in the Tory party. In the speech to which the Foreign Secretary referred yesterday, the Prime Minister said:

> "I have consistently said that we will not accept the pressure to develop Europe as a single train, with all the carriages moving at the same speed."

In claiming consistency for that, the Prime Minister is guilty of a touch of amnesia. Four years ago, after presiding over the Birmingham summit, the Prime Minister reported on a discussion, saying that there would be > "no fast track, no slow track, no one left behind, that was a consistent theme."

Four years ago, no one was to be left behind. Now, Britain can be left behind. What has changed in those four years is not Europe but the Tory party, under a leader who, instead of resisting that change, is drifting with it.

It is the Government's duty to tell the country and the Conservative party about the world as it really is. Tory Members have totally abdicated that duty. [Interruption.] I am talking about those on the Government Front Bench.

I exclude the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) from my strictures, although I do not know if it will do her any good with her colleagues. [Interruption.] If any hon. Members feel that it would be helpful, I would be happy to give them an exclusion policy to be included in their next electoral address.

There is only one way in which the Government's abdication of duty can be fittingly punished and that is by being forced to abdicate from their office of government. Last week, one third of Tory Members—perhaps one third of those present today—voted for a referendum on Europe. There is only one referendum that would offer Britain a real fresh start in Europe, and it is called a general election. I can assure Tory Members that there is no other referendum for which their constituents hunger half as much.

A general election could sweep out of office this historic anachronism masquerading as a Government, with their embarrassing world view dating from the last century, and replace them with a Government who understand that Britain's future is in Europe and who would be prepared to work in co-operation, not confrontation. That is the fresh start in Europe that Britain needs, that is the fresh start that only a change of Government can deliver.

6.2 pm

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): As I abandoned the struggle for power in this Chamber some time ago and as I want to make a helpful contribution to the debate, perhaps I might say a few things that the House will feel are constructive, although it may not like all of them. I also abandoned the screaming between the two Front Benches—in fact, I never had it. We witnessed a great deal of that this afternoon between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

I was rather sad to hear the Prime Minister reproducing, not for the first time, the chant that Harold Wilson had against me of lying on my back exposing my belly to the Europeans. That statement lost him a great deal of respect among those who were concerned about our international relations. I think that three times from the Prime Minister is probably enough in modern circumstances.

The Foreign Secretary emphasised the importance of the meeting in Florence and I agree with him entirely. He also mentioned one or two subjects that are likely to come up. There was the question of various economic matters, which must not be rushed. We must take our time over them.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Davis) indicated assent.

Sir Edward Heath: I see the Minister nodding vigorously.

There is complete condemnation of Britain's approach to these matters. Our approach is entirely unacceptable to other members of the European Union who have, for the past 40 years or so, gone ahead with great leaps, after a fixed time, and reached their conclusions.

I realised the difference acutely when, 10 days ago, I was returning from Lille on the cross-channel train. We roared across the fields of France at between 175 and 180 mph. We came through the tunnel and then roared through the fields of Kent at between 35 and 40 mph. I consoled myself by saying, "Of course, we are going to have a fast link," but then I reminded myself that we decided that eight years ago and so far it has not started. That is one reason why the other member states are so suspicious of us. They do not believe that we want to make a success of our membership of the European Union.

The Foreign Secretary mentioned employment, which is vital. However, I hope that the Government will not spend all their time on the social chapter saying that their view is the answer to everything. It is not. British firms with factories, institutions and services inside other members of the Union are observing the full social chapter with great success. They are not complaining about it.

We had our own arrangements from 1909 onwards when Churchill introduced them as Minister of Labour. I celebrated their 50th anniversary. They contributed greatly to social harmony and did not prevent our economic development or our prosperity; yet those arrangements were abandoned three years ago, and that is claimed to be the secret of our success. It is nothing of the sort. The Foreign Secretary said that we have to compete with the products of the far east. If we are to do that by that method, we will have to go down to the level of the wages in the far east. [Interruption.] That is the logical conclusion. There is no other conclusion. The real conclusion should be that we have to persuade our industrialists to carry on with greater technical efficiency so that they can be competitive while paying their men properly.

I see examples round the country where people have been sacked and kids have been taken on. One knows full well that, when those kids reach the age of 20, they will be sacked and more kids will be taken on. That is not the sort of society for which Conservatives have always worked. I hope that there will not be lectures to the other European Governments about what they should do about the social chapter.

We now come to the main question. I think that the conference is of the utmost importance. I suggest to the Prime Minister that his top priority must be to re-create confidence in this country, not only in the European Union but in the rest of the world. That is his job now. Confidence has been lost over this episode. I have a list of 35 different countries, not just those in the European Union, which will not have anything to do with British beef. The Americans have not touched it since 1988. What was the reason for that? They did not believe that we had taken the measures necessary to prevent the disease from occurring. Canada will not take British beef and nor will Australia. New Zealand has taken it on and off, but Japan will not take it and nor will Singapore. The list goes on and on.

What the Prime Minister has to do—it is a formidable task—is to restore confidence in our country. To look at this from a local point of view, the Prime Minister has also to restore the confidence of the people of this country. All the polls show that it is not the European Union or the outsiders who are being blamed for the beef problem, it is the Government. The task is to restore confidence through the action being taken.

We should remind ourselves how this problem occurred—it was on 20 March, exactly three months ago, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced to all the media that it was now thought that there was a danger of a connection between the animal disease and the human disease. That statement was given enormous prominence throughout the world. It is one reason why confidence must be restored.

What happened next? On 25 March, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said that a large number of animals—up to 4.5 million—would have to be culled. That went around the world and everybody said it was a real crisis. However, in the following week others in the Government said that there was nothing to be afraid of, which produced the reaction, "What are those people doing, then? They are trying to cover up everything—or perhaps they don't realise there is a problem and so are not doing anything to deal with it positively." That is the background.

Like other hon. Members, I do not believe that the blockade policy pursued by the Government has had any effect other than bad. People everywhere cannot understand why we are blocking the very initiatives that we have been trying to bring about ourselves. They say, "If you are going to do it, surely you should be a bit more subtle than that." The British people do not understand it, either.

We have heard a great deal from my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh)—still my friend, I am told—about the necessity to depend purely on scientific advice. We heard from him this afternoon about what the farmers are saying, what the people involved in agricultural machinery are saying, what everybody concerned with agriculture is saying. That is not science, that is politics—understandable politics, because their livelihoods and the future of their children are affected.

What about the political feeling in the other countries in the Union? The demand for beef in Germany has dropped by 40 per cent., in France by 37 per cent., and likewise in the other countries of the Union. That is political, yet we are told that the only answer must be scientific. It just does not add up. What we must do—what I hope my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will do—is try to understand the jam in which the political leaders of the other countries in the Union find themselves. We cannot get away with simply saying, "We will ask the scientists and that will put an end to it all." It will not.

It is not all bad; there is some good. We heard from my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary that he and his colleagues—and, I think, the Prime Minister—now have complete and absolute trust in the Commission and the President of the Commission. [Interruption.] It is a welcome development—[Interruption.] Yes, we are delighted, absolutely delighted. What is more, the Government are now so enthusiastic about the European Court of Justice that they are putting the whole matter before it with complete confidence. I congratulate the Government on their intellectual appreciation of the machinery of the European Union.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister must make a settlement that will restore confidence in this country. He need not worry about the Euro-sceptics—he should forget about them—because they will have to accept any settlement that he makes if the vast majority of hon. Members, the observers and the Union itself says, "This is right; now you are dealing with the situation and producing the necessary answers."

I also suggest to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that he stop reading newspapers—this is a good opportunity, as he is out of the country—because they have descended to a sordid level hitherto unknown in Britain. They are squalid. Of course, they are largely owned by foreigners who have no interest in our welfare. They want only to make money and to break up the European Union if they can. Let us all give up reading newspapers. Stanley Baldwin never read newspapers, and he was Prime Minister for eight or more years. He overcame every difficulty.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North–West Norfolk): A great European.

Sir Edward Heath: Yes, Baldwin was a great European. He talked about the River Rhine in a dramatic speech.

I want to spend a few minutes dealing with the wider issues of Europe. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister must restore confidence in those areas as well. Every ambassador in London knows—as we know and as the press is already reporting—about people in meetings in the wealthier part of Westminster, all discussing how they can get out of the European Union. Everybody knows about that. The only question is, will they be successful? We also know that many of them think that, if we lost the election, that would be to their advantage, as they would then capture the party and make it another anti-European party. That will not happen. We will make sure that it does not happen.

That attitude is weakening this country abroad, which means that it is also weakening investment coming into Britain. Overseas companies say, "If that is going to happen, what long-term future is there? Why should be continue putting investment into Britain in the way we have done for so long?" That is an immense danger.

We have to consider the European Union from the double point of view—political and economic. Its first purpose was political—it always has been and it always will be—and any attempts, as suggested in the White Paper, to turn it into a European free trade area are bound to fail. We do not want it, the other countries will not have it and, if necessary, the other 14 will go off on their own saying, "Right, you look after yourselves."

They are of that mind at this moment because they are so angry about the way in which they think the British are treating them. That is especially true of the French. President Chirac has a terrible job trying to handle this awful problem where France has suddenly found that all the stuff that was vetoed here was promptly exported by British businesses to France, where it was used without anyone knowing about it. That is a horrible situation for President Chirac.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary quoted somebody who had described what she thought the purposes of the EU should be. Those purposes were clearly set out when I signed the treaty that took this country into the Community. They are governed by the fact—which I cited first in a speech opening the negotiations in 1961 and finished with in the debates in the House in October 1972—that we sought an ever closer union. People who now say or write, "We never knew anything about that," are only displaying their ignorance. That fact was constantly emphasised throughout that period. Some hon. Members who were not even born then have the nerve to come here and say, "We never knew anything about that." [Interruption.] I do not dispute that one, but others should be old enough to remember everything that was said at the time. An ever closer union remains the purpose of the European Union.

People say, "Let's get out," but what future is there for this country outside the European Union? What future is there for us politically, internationally or for defence—leaving aside trade and everything else? What future is there in trade? We will not be able to influence the Union. We will have no influence at all.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid–Kent): My right hon. Friend is underestimating our capacity to stand alone on defence matters. We shall actually have both wings of the European fighter aircraft.

Sir Edward Heath: I see; how ingenious.

We must look at the modern world instead of retreating back into orgies of nation states, which is now fashionable in some quarters. In a modern world, with the size of the five major powers, we would have absolutely no influence if we were outside the European Union.

Our task is to use our influence inside the Union. We shall not have influence if we insult our European partners, as was done by two members of the Cabinet at party conference. We shall not influence them by blocking everything or using similar tactics. We shall not influence them by refusing to make constructive proposals or by trying all the time to limit what the Union can do. There is no future for us there. The Prime Minister was absolutely right at the beginning when he said that Britain must be at the heart of Europe, but one cannot be at the heart of Europe if one spends all one's time blocking its arteries. That just does not produce the answer.

Sir Jim Lester (Broxtowe): The Prime Minister has just said that he wants us to be the grit inside the oyster of Europe. One of the good things about grit inside oysters is that it eventually turns into a pearl.

Sir Edward Heath: Yes. I have never found a pearl, but I am told that that is true.

I hope that the Prime Minister will recognise the enormous job he now has in Florence. I hope that he will ignore all the nasty things going on and most of what has been said today—except this speech. I hope that he will aim at restoring confidence in our country and, in that way, in our party.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I will certainly not follow the latter part of the remarks by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) because he erected an Aunt Sally to attack. He has taken on those who want to withdraw totally from the European connection out of hostility towards Europe itself. I suggest that that is a very small part of opinion in this country and that it does not represent the main thrust of those who, like myself, are Euro-realists and who have a different view of the future of Europe from the one that the right hon. Gentleman has always espoused.

One of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, however, was a very useful contribution to the debate; he may be surprised that I agree with him on this matter. He was surely right to remind the House of the immediate occasion for the great worry that afflicted not only this country but Europe and the world generally about British beef. Very properly, he turned back to the statements made on 20 March. They were clumsy, poor statements which relied wholly on some badly expressed scientific views. There was no attempt to put the matter into the context and understanding that only a politician is able to give.

There was a tremendous scare following the statements by the Secretary of State for Health and the Minister of Agriculture, who did not help either. The Secretary of State for Health told people for the first time that scientists could no longer deny that there was a possible connection between CJD and BSE. What on earth did the Government expect would happen immediately after that?

Beef is bound to dominate this debate, as it will dominate the Florence summit. It is a pity really, because, although I do not deny the immediate relevance and great importance of the beef issue, there are other major matters—I suspect in the long term much more serious matters—to be taken up in Europe relating to the intergovernmental conference and the unfinished business of the Maastricht treaty, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup rightly reminded us. It would be a great shame if those matters were not addressed. I hope to say something about them later, because it would be a great mistake if we allowed them to be crowded out.

I will now make my contribution to the beef debate. Like everyone in the House, I hope that there will be agreement in Florence tomorrow on the phased lifting of the European Union ban on British beef. BSE and the export ban are a huge disaster for British farming, and those problems must be removed at the earliest opportunity. But if agreement is reached tomorrow—I am sorry that the Foreign Secretary is not now with us—the Government will have no cause to congratulate themselves. Agreement will not be due to the petulant policy of non-co-operation and vetoing Council business announced by the Prime Minister on 21 May. It will be due, if anything, to the truly remarkable concessions that the Government have been prepared to make to win European acceptance.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), the shadow Foreign Secretary, pointed out, in a few short weeks, the Government have been moved from their original offer to cull 42,000 cattle, conditional on the lifting of the ban, to an unconditional offer of a cull of 80,000 cattle and now to the acceptance of a slaughter programme involving no fewer than 160,000 cattle. It is no good the Foreign Secretary trying to spirit away those figures on the ground that cows are, after all, mortal creatures who eventually die from natural causes.

Furthermore, each stage of the relaxation in the Commission's programme will need to be separately agreed by the Commission and its Standing Veterinary Committee. At all stages of processing, our industry will be invigilated by Commission inspectors. All this despite the Government's insistence, which I accept, that British beef is now safe, in the judgment of our medical and scientific experts, provided only that the health regulations are scrupulously enforced.

Clearly, the European Union has imposed its will on us; I take no pleasure in saying that. However, in this case it would not be right or honest to put the main blame on the European Community. I say that for two reasons. First, I do not forget—who can?—the clumsy, badly presented and ill-thought-out statements of 20 March, to which I have already referred. They were the trigger to the whole series of unhappy events that has followed. The announcements, which were made without any attempt to assess the degree of risk, that a link between BSE and CJD could no longer be ruled out, had an immediate and immense impact on our own people, who cut their consumption of beef by 50 per cent. If there was panic here, one can hardly be surprised that there was panic abroad.

Secondly, it would be wrong to argue that the initial imposition of the ban was due to any special malignancy on the part of our continental neighbours and other hon. Members have referred to this point already. The United States, New Zealand, Hong Kong and Canada are all well disposed towards this country, yet they have found it right to impose a similar ban on British beef.

Following their statements on 20 March, the Government have now found it difficult to restore the confidence that was destroyed, not surprisingly. Beef consumption here has now recovered substantially, but the beef crisis has had two additional effects on public opinion in Britain which need to be addressed. The first, which I deplore, has been an outpouring of frustrated hostility, whipped up by much of the tabloid press, against Germany in particular and the European Community in general. It has been a pretty squalid performance by a large part of the British press.

The second consequence, which I welcome, has been a new alertness in the public—almost an education—about what is involved in our membership of the European Union, which is an ever-increasing dominance of the Brussels authorities.

What left many people thunderstruck by the response from the Commission and from European countries was not the alarmed reactions of the Governments of Germany, France, Italy and others on public health grounds about our beef exports, or even the unwelcome decision of the European Commission, backed by the Agriculture Council, to ban our exports to all European countries. What shocked British opinion was the European decision to ban our exports worldwide, and the realisation that European institutions had the power to make such decisions and that the elected Government and Parliament of Britain were obliged to obey them, with recourse only to the European Court of Justice. It alerted British opinion as never before to the massive transfers of power that have already taken place from Britain to Europe and the greater transfers of power envisaged in the Maastricht treaty.

Our people are massively opposed to membership of a European federal state. That is the main argument. They have come to realise just how major a step towards that federal goal would be taken were we to adopt a single European currency and to subject ourselves to an European central bank.

The latest survey of public opinion in Britain on the single currency was the Harris poll published in The Independent yesterday. In reply to the question:

"Should there be a single European currency with key decisions on interest rates and monetary policy decided by a new European Central Bank?"

78 per cent. of respondents said no and only 18 per cent. said yes. It is equally interesting that 70 per cent. of the Germans polled and 55 per cent. of the French also said no to a single currency.

The distance between the classe politique in European countries and the opinions and wishes of their people has never been wider than on the issue of the single European currency and final stages of economic and monetary union. However, it is not only the federal and constitutional issues involved that should disturb people here and elsewhere in Europe; it is the baneful economic consequences on unemployment that a single currency and an European central bank would involve.

One of the documents listed in the usual clutch of documents that always attends such general debates is the Community guidelines on economic policies—a document that is published regularly under article 103(2) of the Maastricht treaty. Europe is now an area of disgracefully high unemployment. Nearly 20 million people—more than 11 per cent. of the labour force—are out of work.

The most interesting and disturbing part of the document is the section dealing with economic forecasts for 1996 and 1997. Those who might hope and expect some amelioration of unemployment in Europe will get no encouragement from the document. It reads as follows:

"Given the anticipated weak expansion of economic activity in early 1996, employment trends are expected to remain weak in the months ahead . . . In Germany and Austria, employment is expected to fall considerably."

If that prediction holds true, 1996 will be the fifth consecutive year of job losses in Germany. The document continues:

"In Belgium, Denmark, France and Portugal employment is now expected to stagnate or fall this year."

That is not a very happy outlook.

What advice does the Commission offer the European nation states—the European Union? Incredibly, its principal recommendation calls for "sound public finances". By that it means further cuts in public expenditure in member states and further reductions in their borrowing requirements. In short, it recommends measures that must certainly increase unemployment in the European Union.

Why has the Commission made recommendations against all common sense and instinct, at a time when Governments should be thinking of maintaining public expenditure and Government borrowing, if not increasing it? At such a time, why has the European Commission made a recommendation above all for sound public finances—in order to achieve the convergence guidelines laid down in the Maastricht treaty to enable Europe to move towards a single currency in 1998.

Last weekend, Bonn saw its biggest demonstration since the second world war against planned German Government policy. We all remember vividly the widespread disruption in Paris and other French cities just before Christmas, when President Chirac announced a similar programme of retrenchment and contraction in France. Those are the policies of the madhouse.

Of course the Commission will table another package of so-called job creation measures at Florence, using the regular technique that has been employed during the past two or three years, first by Mr. Delors in his so-called White Paper and by others. They will be tiny measures of a wholly trans-European nature that might engage an insignificant fraction of the unemployed populations of Europe in those great European projects, but it is basically a policy of subterfuge and camouflage to disguise the truth—that the central impact of Commission and European policy should be deflation in order to achieve a single currency.

What would happen if we achieved a single currency? We must all have seen references to the proposal by Dr. Waigel, the German Finance Minister, that, once a single currency had been achieved, there should be a further discipline—not that we should be allowed to borrow 3 per cent. of GDP, but that it should be reduced to 1 per cent. of GDP in the overriding search for price stability.

We have plenty of price stability in Europe. Inflation is virtually non-existent in most European countries. That is not the problem. Inflation was yesterday's problem. Today, the problem is deflation. We should be taking the lead—as I hope the Government will—in trying to get our European neighbours and partners to co-operate in policies designed to stimulate our economies in a sensible and responsible way in the pursuit of the greater prosperity and the higher employment of all our peoples.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): So far, the debate has been almost entirely confined to the beef crisis. That is no great surprise, because it has been the greatest shock that has befallen the United Kingdom this year and I am quite sure that it ought to be taken seriously.

What has come out perhaps worst of all are the atavistic tendencies of papers such as The Daily Telegraph and The Times—both, incidentally, under foreign ownership—and of course The Sun, and the way in which they have regarded the affair as a war against our European partners. That has been a most disgraceful performance, and I greatly regret it if any of my hon. Friends or any Opposition Members take the view that progress can be achieved by being bloody to the Europeans on any long-term basis.

I accepted that a policy of non-co-operation was necessary, but I did so with great sadness, because I could see that the European leaders were not concentrating sufficiently on the proposals that we had brought before them. Happily, however, it now seems that progress can be made at Florence, and I very much hope that that will be the case.

The lesson, especially for those who think that we can play our part outside the European Union, is that, in the first place, the United States, Canada and most other countries have refused to take our beef for many years. That was nothing whatever to do with the European Union. In order to get the thing straight and to recover the situation, we appealed to that much maligned institution, the European Court of Justice, and it was the European Commission that managed to save the situation with regard to tallow and those other substances.

It is worth remembering that, if we were outside the European Union, we would not have been able to persuade any country to lift the ban on our beef—certainly not any country in the EU. As is so often the case, the importance of our membership of the EU is emphasised by what has happened during the beef crisis.

It is not hard to criticise the institutions of the European Union. They can all be at fault, as can any human institution. It is not hard to criticise the direction in which the EU is going sometimes. But it is essential that we always remember that we are members of some 20 years' standing, and that our trade and business is now knitted in to the EU. Europe is where we do the largest proportion of our trade, and it brings us substantial benefits.

The single market is not perfect; of course there is room for improvement. But can anybody believe that we would secure such improvement if we were outside the European Union, bashing against the walls, rather than as a full committed member?

There are some who say that we would do better to forget our trade with the EU and concentrate instead on our trade with the far east. I do not deny that our trade with the far east is of great promise and potential, and I see no reason why we should not develop it as much as possible, but I cannot see why that should in any way detract from the importance of our trade within the EU. In fact, it supports that trade, because there is also no question but that this country attracts enormous inward investment precisely because we are a member of the EU. We would be less likely to attract that inward investment if we were outside it.

To claim, as some do, that we would nevertheless be able to function perfectly well in some sort of free trade area, and that the EU would be happy to grant us that status, seems to me to fly in the face of reality. After all, we would then be in the position of a supplicant, not that of a full member of the EU, negotiating constantly for improvements.

Of course the single market stands in need of improvement. In my opinion we need to extend it to the eastern European countries. We need to broaden its scope, extend its borders, and remove some of the restrictive practices. The House will recall that, about nine months ago, British Airways had a problem with landing at Orly airport. Does anybody believe that the French would have taken the smallest notice of our position if we had been outside the European Union? It was only because we were a member that Air France was made to alter its policy on landing rights. That seems to me to be a practical argument.

I know that some people use arguments that rest on sovereignty—especially, as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) has just said, those about the single currency. Those arguments need to be taken seriously, but, as the House knows, we have secured an opt-out from the single currency, and will not be bound by it whatever may happen.

We have now reached the point where there would be a referendum if the Cabinet—and, I suggest, Parliament too, because it is inconceivable that a referendum would be held unless Parliament had first given its view—came to a decision on a single currency, after consultation on the subject. So it can hardly be said that the Government are hell bent on a single currency. I can tell some of my hon. Friends, as well as some Opposition Members such as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, that there is no prospect of any hell bent progress towards a single currency.

[Sir Peter Hordern]

However, it is the question of sovereignty that so alarms some of my hon. Friends, for all sorts of good and no doubt traditional historic reasons.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Surely the issue is not just a matter of sovereignty in the broad sense, but of legislative authority for domestic purposes. Does not the right hon. Gentleman agree that, had the arrangements for Europe stopped at the treaty of Rome, or perhaps even at the Single European Act, there would not be those difficulties for the Conservative party? What some Conservative Members, as well as other people, are worried about is exactly what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) talked about—the obligation to move towards an ever closer union. For some of us that means a union with a unitary state, and the virtual elimination of the national option in the end.

Sir Peter Hordern: So far as I am aware, the movement towards an ever closer union was part of the preamble to the treaty of Rome, so the House knew what it was doing when it signed up to that, and we must accept the consequences of having done so.

The other important point about sovereignty is the fact that we have been happy to share our sovereignty as a member of NATO for many years. The idea that we could defend ourselves entirely alone, without being a member of NATO, is ridiculous.

Of course, we have had the sovereign right to devalue our currency for a significant time—and a fat lot of good it has done us. Because of that sovereign right, we have seen our currency greatly devalued. When I first entered the House, there were 12 deutschmarks to the pound; I cannot remember the relative values of all the other currencies. We have seen an incessant fall in the value of the pound against the currencies of our major competitors.

All Governments depend on the ability to borrow money, and as a result of that devaluation there is no market prepared to lend money to this country other than at a higher rate of interest than that obtainable for stronger currencies, because the lenders know that our currency is likely to depreciate rather than to appreciate. Our sovereign right to devalue has meant in effect that we have had consistently higher interest rates than our competitor countries. All that has imposed a certain charge on industry and business.

There is something else that I must mention in connection with the single currency. As I shall go on to explain, I do not think that it would be practical, and for that reason I do not favour it. But are some people really saying that we should have no regard to the strength of sterling, despite our historic experience of being connected to the gold standard for 300 years, and also of being tied to the United States dollar for 25 years after the war, through the Bretton Woods agreement? Nobody accused Winston Churchill of surrendering our sovereignty in those years; it would have been absurd to do so.

We in the House must recognise the fact that it is quite likely that there will be a strong European currency among the core countries within the European Union, whether we like it or not. We must therefore concern ourselves with how that will affect our business and trade. At the very least, the euro will be a formidable competitor for sterling, because it is bound to circulate freely within the countries. Some 40 per cent. of our trade is with Germany, France and the Netherlands, and it is likely that business will be contracted and settled in the currency.

I do not know how long it will take, but the euro will act first as a common currency in this country. After a long period, we may well find that it is preferred to sterling, partly because of pressure upon sterling and partly because it is likely that the currency will have lower interest rates than sterling if the criteria of the Maastricht treaty are abided by.

Whether we like it or not, it is likely that there will be a strong euro used by a core of strong countries. No matter how many referendums we have, the issue will be decided by consumer preference. Who can tell what will happen? Some people believe that the euro will never be used in this country, but I am not so sure. France, Germany and the Benelux countries will decide to introduce such a currency. We may think that that is not in their economic interests, but there is a strong political will for such a currency in those countries. We may not like it, but that political will has been there for many years. It is unlikely to desist just because we tell the countries that it is not in their economic interests to continue.

France and Germany are no less sovereign countries than the UK. If their Governments, Parliaments and people decide for political reasons that they want a single currency, there is—whatever treaties may say—not much that we or anybody else can do about it. We must look at reality and at what will happen in the future, and that makes it all the more necessary that we remain a full member of the EU. We must influence events as best we can in the form of a Europe of sovereign nations that recognises all the time the direction in which the most powerful nations wish to go.

I am not in favour of an all-powerful European Parliament, as it would be a great mistake for democracy ever to depart too far from its natural roots. So far ahead as one can see, these roots lie in national Parliaments rather than the European Parliament. In my view, the sovereign test of a sovereign Parliament is its power to tax and spend, and that power must remain with national Parliaments and must not be ceded to the EU or the European Parliament.

In the long run, neither Governments nor Parliaments can affect the livelihoods and welfare of the people of Europe as much as the movements of capital and technology. As a full member of the EU, we must see to it that those movements proceed in the most efficient way within the enormous single market. After all—we have learnt our lessons on this—markets dictate interest rates. We must play our full part in what is now a loose confederation of nations within the EU which may, in due course, become something closer. It is no good us retiring to our tent in a sulk. There is a strong core of European countries determined to draw ever closer, and we must recognise that. I wish my right hon. and hon. Friends every success in the negotiations that lie before them in Florence, and we should negotiate in the fullest sense as a full member of the European Union.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I very much welcome the tone and the constructive contribution to the debate of the right hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern). Those of us who are aficionados of these European debates have notched up something of a first tonight, in that the first two speeches from Conservative Back Benchers have been positively pro-European and constructive in tone and approach. That is welcome on an all-party basis, because if a criticism can be made of those of us in the pro-European camp, it is that, in recent years, we have been frankly too complacent in allowing the critics and those who wish to deconstruct the European Union too much time and space to make mischief and thoroughly to misrepresent what is going on.

The Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), gave some friendly advice to the Prime Minister, advising him not to read the newspapers. If one looks at the verdict of the newspapers on what is on offer ahead of the weekend summit, one will see that the Prime Minister might be tempted to take the advice of his distinguished predecessor. The Government, who prepared the way so well for the Scott report recently, have not done a good job in advance briefing on the likely outcome to the beef fiasco, and they have persuaded no one.

Prime Minister's Question Time today was a classic example of the weakness of the case that the Government have advanced as some kind of victory. Not one Conservative Back Bencher asked a question on that issue. They were more intent on talking about the Leader of the Opposition's recent excursion to Bonn than about the apparent victory that the Government have secured as a result of their non-co-operation policy.

That attitude has been reflected in the press. Let us be fair and take a number of newspapers that are normally, if not completely loyal to the Conservative party, more to the right of centre in their editorial stance than to the left. The Daily Mail said:

"John Major has sounded the retreat in the beef battle with Europe."

The verdict of The Daily Telegraph was:

"Surrender by Britain on beef ban".

The Financial Times was rather more generous in its editorial today and described the proposals as "tough but fair", but added that the Prime Minister "should abandon his silly policy of disrupting EU procedures and move the BSE problem from politics into the realm of veterinary science where it belongs".

That was perhaps one of the kinder remarks made about the Government.

The Evening Standard—a paper that normally takes a robust, Conservative and right-wing view of the world—began its editorial today by saying:

"Mr. John Major's beef war with Europe has always been ludicrous. Since it was founded upon a wanton deceit—that the mad cow crisis is somehow Europe's fault, rather than the consequence of a catastrophic failure of government regulation—it can only end in one way, with a British government climbdown".

A fairly unanimous cross-media consensus has developed, and it is a fair reflection of the sorry outcome to the entire affair.

The shadow Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), told me a few moments ago that he could not be in the Chamber at this stage of the evening, and I accept that. But I want to make a straightforward criticism of Labour's approach, as it should not be allowed to get off scot-free for its activities during the past two or three weeks. Labour Front Benchers have tried to run with the hounds and the hare on this issue. It seems to me that one could either back the Government or not—the Liberal Democrats did not, and we have been consistent in our opposition to the entire non-co-operation approach. But Labour has sent out confusing and conflicting smoke signals to appease more than one audience, and it has not come out with any great credit.

In the run-up to Florence, the potential deal on the table seems to depend on who blinks first, although neither the Foreign Secretary nor the Prime Minister referred to that aspect this afternoon. We can have progress of the type that is on offer if we agree in advance to lift non-co-operation. The Government's position has been that we will certainly not lift non-co-operation until we have a satisfactory deal in place.

I suspect that the one-hour time difference between here and Florence will provide a suitable diplomatic stand-off that will allow a fudge to take place, and that non-co-operation will be lifted miraculously at much the same time as a deal is concluded. If that is the case, let us be clear that what has been agreed and accepted now by the Government is a good way short of the objectives that they set out on 21 and 22 May.

Let us never forget what the Press Association reported Downing street as having said on the record the day after the Prime Minister made his opening statement in the House. Downing street has never sought to contradict it. It said:

"Nothing short of a full timetable for the phased lifting of the entire ban will be sufficient."

It is clear from listening to the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister this afternoon that what is on offer here is not a full timetable for the phased lifting of the entire ban.

The Government now adduce arguments as to why that may not be deliverable or desirable. One of those arguments, with which I have considerable sympathy, is that, rather than following a rigid timetable that pays no attention to the veterinary or scientific evidence, it is better to set targets, meet them and then progress beyond that. But the fact of the matter is that that ain't what they said on day one. It may be what they are saying now, but it is a retreat from their opening position, and it should be seen as such.

The second aspect, which has already been touched on, is that a greater slaughter is now envisaged than previously. My right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) handed me a fax earlier in the debate from the National Farmers Union south-west regional advisory board, which met today and discussed the Government's proposals for a greater selective slaughter. Its position is probably typical of NFU opinion throughout the United Kingdom. It said:

"We do not accept the principle of a selective cull, as it would add nothing to public safety, would involve the slaughter of a disproportionately large number of cattle which would never have developed BSE, and would cause great distress to the many farmers and their families who would lose a significant proportion of their herds."

It went on to detail five conditions for its acquiescence in a selective cull.

The point is surely that the Government have not only had to back-track—that is one thing—but, in back-tracking, have stored up problems for the future in Europe. The European consumer is hardly likely to believe any Government when they say that veterinary or scientific opinion requires X, Y or Z in years to come. We have rather undercut that principle by saying, "We know that this is not necessary, but we are going to do it anyway." That is hardly the way to send a signal of confidence to consumers. It may be necessary to break the logjam at Florence, but we should be under no illusion but that we might be storing up problems for ourselves in years to come.

[Mr. Charles Kennedy]

A third aspect of the potential deal before us is the missed opportunity caused by what we have vetoed en route to the juncture at which we now find ourselves. We have used the veto more than 70 times in the past two or three weeks. We have blocked measures that would have countered terrorism, fraud, drug smuggling and corruption—all things that were high on the British list of desires. We have blocked various economic measures. One was a £10 billion scheme designed to help put 8 million unemployed people back to work. On social policy, we have vetoed an anti-racism directive. We have blocked practical help for travellers who need emergency passports. We have blocked various laudable aims to provide international aid. The damage to a set of schemes and objectives to which we adhere and aspire, as well as the diplomatic damage, has made the price not at all one worth paying.

Earlier today I was in Bonn, where I had the opportunity to meet the Minister of State's opposite number—the European Union Minister in the German Administration, Werner Hoyer—and I asked him straight, "Do you think that the tactics that the British Government have pursued in the past two or three weeks have brought forward the achievement of any of the aims that they set themselves—the earlier breakthrough in having the derivatives ban partially lifted or the deal that is now on the table?" I wished to know from the Minister's opposite number, whom he knows well, with whom he personally gets on well and has a good relationship, whether in his view the non-co-operation policy had advanced the British cause one iota. The Minister replied, "Absolutely not." He went on to describe the Government's approach as "disastrous". That was the view of the Minister's opposite number, a member of the Free Democratic party, but serving within Chancellor Kohl's coalition Administration.

In his speech yesterday on the attitude of our partners, when I was relieved to hear him describe other European countries as our partners, the Prime Minister came out with a splendid analysis of the attitude of other member states, of which the German attitude that I encountered this morning was only too typical. The Prime Minister said yesterday:

"It was the unwillingness of our partners to enter discussions and reach agreements in this way which led us to suspend normal dealings."

He went on to acknowledge:

"I understand their difficulties with their hostile public opinion. We've often faced that difficulty ourselves."

Well, my goodness me. His audience must have been greatly taken by surprise at the frank admission from the British Prime Minister that the Government have occasionally faced hostile public opinion. He continued:

"But there is no sensible alternative—for them or for us—to reaching conclusions based on evidence and science."

That goes to the heart of the matter. Suspicion took root at European level because the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in particular handled the matter in an utterly ham-fisted way at the outset. It seemed that Britain was more concerned about getting the ban lifted than about eradicating BSE. That was the political poison in the system, which did for us in the past few weeks.

So we now have some ironies as we look at what will be the likely conclusion to all this. First, at intergovernmental conference level, Britain is pushing to rein in the powers of the European Commission and scale down the competencies and powers of the European Court of Justice. Yet, as the Prime Minister pointed out in his speech, which two sets of institutions at European level have been of most value to us? Why, the European Commission and the European Court of Justice. The irony of that is not lost on those who listen to the arguments advanced by the Minister and his colleagues in the context of the IGC.

Secondly, we should remember that the Commission paper expressed

"considerable misgiving about the effectiveness of past actions taken by the UK".

We should not overlook the conclusion in the paper that "more of the British monitoring and control will now have to be submitted for consultation and approval at Brussels level."

It is a high irony that the Euro-sceptics, particularly among the Conservatives, who have been so full-throated and vocal in their gung-ho support for the Government, have helped to engender an outcome that has handed more power to Brussels. Little wonder that, with two honourable exceptions, they are rather noticeable by their absence from the debate this afternoon.

The third and sad irony is the damage that has been done to our diplomatic and political standing within the EU, and therefore to our longer-term national interest. The conclusion from this sad and sorry episode for the Government and the Conservative party is that there is no point in trying to appease their sceptics in the hope of suing for peace within their party or at European level. It will not work.

For example, a few weeks ago the House approved the Government's White Paper, which set out their objectives for the IGC. Yet in the few weeks since then, almost a third of parliamentary Tory party, on separate occasions, has voted for two ten-minute Bills—one that was euphemistically described as being about the reform of the European Court of Justice and the other for a referendum—both of which would blow apart the carefully constructed compromises in the White Paper and the subsequent Cabinet compromise over the party's attitude to the eventual referendum.

The Government have fed the insatiable appetite of the Euro-sceptics, and we are beginning to discover, as they become more emboldened, the real terminus of their argument. It is not reform of the ECJ, the reining-in of the Commission or a curb on the powers of the Parliament: it is withdrawal. That is what the Euro-sceptics want, and that is the logical conclusion to which they would lead this country, by unstitching Maastricht and withdrawing the competencies of the ECJ.

I welcome the Confederation of British Industry to the debate on Europe. The CBI, and in particular Mr. Niall Fitzgerald, was right to say that loose talk at European level costs British jobs. It does, and we should be clear about that as the debate unfolds.

I have not yet mentioned proportional representation and voting reform for European elections in debates on Europe. I hope that the Minister will consider that issue in the context of the IGC. My colleague in the European Parliament, Graham Watson, has persistently questioned successive presidencies of the European Union about their attitude. I also wish to pay tribute to the Europewide European Movement, which last week published a paper on the issue, which was written by Mr. Andrew Duff, the director of the Federal Trust.

I shall not go into the merits of the different systems, but it is clear that the case for this country's European elections to be based on the same principle of proportionality as those in the rest of the European Union, including Northern Ireland, is overwhelming. By electing our Euro-seats in England, Scotland and Wales under the first-past-the-post system, we are exporting our domestic political distortions to the Brussels Parliament. That should be of concern to people across the political spectrum because of its negative effect.

I hope that, if the beef crisis ends—at least in the immediate diplomatic sense, because it will not end in the longer-term agricultural sense—the Government will learn the error and folly of their ways of the past few weeks. The Government cannot appease their Back Benchers, whose one objective is the ultimate disengagement of this country from the rest of Europe. They want to railroad the entire momentum of the European Union. The Government should take a more robust and constructive stance and, if they are not prepared to do so, they should make way for an Administration who would.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before I call the next hon. Member to speak, I remind the House that speeches will be limited to 10 minutes from now on.

7.12 pm

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid–Sussex): I shall disappoint the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) because my speech will be the third consecutive speech from a Conservative Back Bencher in favour of Europe and of our remaining at the heart of Europe. I have no doubt that that fact, despite the ten-minute Bills and the vocal noises made by the Euro-sceptics to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, reflects the true opinion of the majority of Conservative Members.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has left on his plane for Florence, and I am sure that he goes with all our good wishes for a solution to the beef crisis in the IGC that starts tomorrow morning. In the minutes allotted to me, I shall make only one comment about the beef crisis, which is that I feel deeply sorry for all my right hon. Friends who have been involved in trying to solve it. It is a classic case, in which both scientists and politicians are involved. Scientists do not know enough about politics and politicians do not know enough about science. The world public distrust both.

I stress the word "world". We have got used to the concept of the globalisation of interest rates and the fact that what happens in Tokyo tonight will affect London tomorrow morning and New York tomorrow afternoon. The beef crisis has taught us about the globalisation, or world worry about health problems. Thanks to CNN, Sky and BBC Worldwide, from the moment that the Secretary of State for Health spoke in the House three months ago, fewer Russians went to McDonald's in Moscow and Japanese housewives switched from beef back to traditional diets of fish. The origin of the beef did not matter.

In the sad beef affair, one headline in one of the tabloids made me laugh. The headline was in the Evening Standard early in the crisis and it said simply "Britain cuts off continent". What a marvellous, out-of-date, totally antediluvian thought. It is impossible now, of course, for Britain to cut itself off from the continent. As Russia found in eastern Europe, walls and barriers no longer work. I shall spend the next few minutes on that theme.

In recent months, I have met business men and politicians from France, Sweden, Germany and Italy. I have noticed that every one of them expects economic and monetary union to happen. Without exception, they look forward to it and they are not worried about the effects on their national Parliament or on national sovereignty. The likely scenario for the next three years—from now to the millennium—is an unchangeable process towards a single currency.

The single currency will start in 1999 and—I am even more positive about this than my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern)—when it starts, Benelux, France, Germany, Austria, Ireland, Spain and Portugal will all join and Italy will be in the wings waiting. From the moment that that happens, the relations between those in the single currency and those outside it are bound to be somewhat strained. For that reason, people such as Mr. Lamfalussy of the European Monetary Institute are now talking about a second exchange rate mechanism or stability pacts to govern the relations between those in and out of economic and monetary union.

I believe also that we shall have a referendum on the single currency in 1998, which will turn into a referendum on the principle of our membership of the European Union. If the result of the vote is no to joining EMU, which will be assumed to be binding on us for 10 to 20 years—as the Norwegian no was—our Euro-partners will lose patience with us, and they will cease trying to accommodate us.

The net result will be that, whatever the official treaties say, the directives that are important to us, such as the investment services directive, will start to be tweaked to our disadvantage. Those at the heart of the European Union and EMU, using phrases such as, "provided that it is in the long-term interest of the European Union" or, "subject to the public interest" will find ways to use those directives to our disadvantage. Those ways will probably be like the Poitiers solution, which was, as the House will remember, the French way of allowing Japanese videos into their country. They sent all the videos to Poitiers, which has no customs officials, so the videos languished there in a warehouse for a long time.

The disadvantages will grow and the effects on us as an international exporter will become increasingly severe. Sterling long-term interest rates will be subject to devaluation and fluctuation and will be 2 per cent. higher than Euro-interest rates. My right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham made that point earlier and he will know, as I do, that French long-term interest rates are now already lower than British long-term interest rates, simply because it is expected that the franc will join the euro.

The non-social costs and the non-productive costs for manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom will be about 3 to 4 per cent. higher than those for comparable industry in the economic and monetary union. Those figures were given to me just yesterday by a leading business man with factories throughout the European Union, who was deeply worried that companies such as his would, in a few years' time, be centring their activities on countries that they know are, and will remain, at the heart of Europe. That is something to which those who do not believe in our membership of the European Union—the Euro-sceptics—will have to face up. At that stage, the withdrawal of Britain from the European Union could become a possibility. That would be disastrous for investment, employment and economic growth in the United Kingdom.

Meanwhile, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said, our partners in the European Union are going ahead and preparing the modalities for making the single currency happen—a report on that will be presented to the IGC. They believe that the euro will allow maximisation of advantages in the European Union. Although, as it has been put to me, we now have the free movement of people and services, there still remains the barrier of exchange rates, which is costly. Within EMU, there will be better control of non-productive costs and Europe will be more competitive in world markets.

The link between the European single market and monetary union is a logical consequence of the single market. With the free circulation of capital that we and our European partners now insist upon, monetary policies cannot remain independent of each other. That reasoning lies at the heart of the adoption of Maastricht treaty. The single market is not compatible with monetary instability, and it is to avoid monetary instability that monetary union will come into place. As we have seen in recent years, exchange rate depreciation by some inevitably leads to protectionist measures by others.

Therefore, the challenge for those on both sides of the House who believe in Europe is now to consider the possibility of EMU with an open mind and to believe in an even more successful and complete single market, in which we in Britain can prosper to an even greater extent than we do at present.

I shall end by reminding the House of the words of John Donne. He said:

"No man is an Island, entire of it self; every man is a piece of the Continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less".

We should not approach the future of the European Union, and economic and monetary union within it, with pessimism or despair; we should not be driven back into insularity and nationalism. We should approach the future of the EU with vision, hope and passion, believing that that is where our economic success lies.

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): The right hon. Member for Mid–Sussex (Mr. Renton) will not be surprised to learn that I very much agreed with what he said. However, I do not want to follow him on this occasion, but wish to say some words about the beef crisis and what we have learnt from it.

I, like other hon. Members, hope that the Government will be able to take away from Florence a framework for taking the measures necessary to ensure the safety of British beef, to restore consumer confidence across Europe and, eventually, to remove the ban on British beef. I entirely understand and sympathise with the position of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the policy of non-co-operation. During the crisis, they did not wish to be accused of undermining the Government's position, as they certainly would have been had they adopted the policy suggested by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy). There is an argument for saying that the policy helped to concentrate minds—I suspect that it concentrated the minds of British Ministers as much as the minds of the continentals.

The Government's handling of the beef crisis, especially the policy of non-co-operation, could do lasting damage to our relations with our European partners. As hon. Members have reminded us, it is a British problem and not a predominantly European problem. There have been 150,000 cases of BSE in this country and, as I understand it, there have been about 400 cases in all the other member states combined, which illustrates that it is a British problem. Given that fact, given the single market and given the impact on consumers across Europe and on the European beef industry, it is not surprising that other countries feel entitled to hold a view on what we are doing to eradicate BSE. That fact must be clear to all hon. Members.

I fear that, as the Commission said, the Government did too little, too late to deal with the problem of BSE. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said, the Government mishandled the announcement of the news that BSE might be linked to CJD. The first that the Europeans heard of it was when it was announced to the House by the Secretary of State for Health, so it is not surprising that they reacted as they did.

If the framework is agreed at Florence, will it be because of the non-co-operation policy? That is what the Foreign Secretary claims, but I am sceptical. Curiously enough, there has been some impact on our own policy. As has already been said, we have now produced a policy to eradicate BSE that we have explained to our partners. Most important, the Foreign Secretary, the Minister of Agriculture and others have been visiting the European capitals in the past month in the way they should have been doing in the previous two months. That is why we are now heading towards a solution. Those visits have been much more important than the non-co-operation policy.

As some hon. Members have said, the irony is that we have been relying on the much-hated Commission to pull irons out of the fire. It has been the European Court of Justice to which we have appealed when we have been in trouble. It is the qualified majority vote in the Council of Ministers on which we shall rely when we want to win our case. Some countries may vote against us, but we shall need a majority. It will be European compensation that will help our farmers. For those reasons, the framework of the European Union is helping us to solve the crisis in a way that would not happen if we were dealing with the 14 different nations individually.

Of course, the policy comes at a cost. I understand the position of the Labour Front-Bench team, but there has been a cost. That cost has involved the 73 measures that have been vetoed in the Council of Ministers. Those measures include many policies dear to many hon. Members: anti-fraud measures; cutting red tape in Europe, which hon. Members say is so important; and agreement on the Europol drugs unit and action against terrorists. The list of measures that we have vetoed looks pretty ludicrous when one starts to examine it.

The cost to us is also that we are now isolated. As I travel round the capitals of Europe, I cannot remember a time when the United Kingdom's reputation has been so low. I sometimes feel ashamed of our position and of being a Briton in these circumstances. The Prime Minister talks about flexibility on the European issue and flexibility inside the European Union, but the problem is that the others are thinking of inserting a flexible clause into the treaty that they will use to go ahead without us. That is the great problem and the danger—the French and Germans have already been talking about it. It is a reaction to us and to the fact that we are seen as negative and carping. There is a major problem in terms of our long-term relationship with the EU, and the question is whether we have damaged it even further by what has happened with beef.

One good thing, however, has come out of the crisis. Hon. Members have rightly talked about the appalling way in which the press, particularly the tabloid press, has behaved; but more important is the fact that many of the Euro-sceptics have shown their true colours and admitted that coming out of the EU is on their agenda. Some hon. Members will shake their heads. The right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) and the hon. Members for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) are honest, but others called for such things as repatriating many policies to Westminster, reasserting the primacy of British law in all cases, eliminating or emasculating the Court of Justice, abolishing direct elections to the European Parliament, opting out of the British fisheries policies. Those policies are not compatible with membership of the EU.

At least the Euro-sceptics have shown their true colours during this crisis. Indeed, one or two of them said privately to me that they hoped that the beef crisis would enable them to develop their true policy of leaving the EU. It is interesting that they are not in the Chamber this evening. One or two are present, but not many, which is unusual. I think that they are right to hang their heads in shame. They have, however, done us all a service: they have made clear their position and awakened the rest of us to the dangers of what is happening. I welcome what the chairman of the Confederation of British Industry, Mr. Fitzgerald, said about how dangerous to British interest is all the loose talk about leaving the EU.

I welcome the debate. It is about not just the single currency but British membership. I am certain that the supporters of British membership of the EU, which is so much in our national interest, will win that debate.

7.32 pm

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) chided us because some of my hon. Friends who are Euro-sceptics are not here in sufficient number. The reason for that, of course, is that they are supporting a great British national institution called Ascot. They have left me behind as their representative.

I shall start in the same way as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) by briefly summarising my personal attitude—as a Euro-sceptic who voted against every stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993—towards the European Union. Contrary to what the hon. Member for North Durham said, I do not wish Britain to leave the EU, and few of my hon. Friends who share my Euro-sceptic views have that wish. I want Britain to remain within the EU, but as an independent sovereign nation state governed by Ministers answerable to a Westminster Parliament, whose decisions cannot be overridden by any European institution or court.

In so far as we have already been pushed from that position, I wish to see the key abdicated powers repatriated to this Parliament and our courts.

Mr. Robin Cook: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I would be delighted to give way, but I cannot because of the ten-minute rule. That is why I so disapprove of these ten-minute rule debates. I would like to speak for an hour.

If the federalists here, such as the hon. Member for North Durham, and those overseas say that my position is incompatible with the treaty of Rome as it has been developed by subsequent legislation and practice, let them try to drive Britain out of the EU. So far as I know—[Interruption.] I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) is not going to snigger throughout my speech. We all know his views. Perhaps he will allow me to put mine.

So far as I know, there is no legal machinery by which a parliamentary democracy can be expelled or suspended from membership of the EU. If some other states want to tear up the existing treaties and start again with a new European political and monetary union, as has been suggested by one or two hon. Members today, a Union from which Britain would be excluded, let them try, and let us use our best endeavours to frustrate them. I certainly have no secret agenda in mind to try to bring Britain out of the EU, and I shall fight tooth and nail in this Parliament and the next, if I am elected to it, to see that we are not driven out by the federalists. If anybody has a secret agenda, it may be them.

Talk about British isolation in all this is greatly exaggerated. How many Frenchmen would be happy for long in a German-dominated EU in which there was no British counter-balance? For France, culturally and politically, it would be a form of national suicide. They know that. Of course Britain could survive and thrive outside the EU. I do not have time to develop the detail of that argument, but it is worth bearing it in mind that only 9 per cent. of the total profits of British business as a whole is earned in the EU, which means that 91 per cent. is earned outside it. It would be much better for Britain and far better for Europe that we should be in that union of nation states, which our Prime Minister has often described as his aim, as recently as yesterday, and which De Gaulle defined as a "Europe des Patries". There is overwhelming support for that concept among the British people, but for no other form of European Union.

The French language and intellect lends itself to penetrating political statements. Lytton Strachey wrote that, between the collapse of the Roman empire and the start of the industrial revolution, only three men became the intellectual masters of Europe—Bernard of Clairvaux, Erasmus and Voltaire. Voltaire argued that the British political classes were the only ones in Europe capable of understanding the feelings of the masses. That is still true today. It is probably truer today than at any time since 1789.

As the Harris poll, quoted by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, in yesterday's edition of The Independent makes clear, despite the fact that the classe politique in continental Europe is so committed to the idea of a single currency, the Germans oppose it by 70 per cent. to 29 per cent. and the French by 55 per cent. to 43 per cent. In Britain, there is a huge 4:1 majority against joining a single currency. The Euro-sceptics, of course, represent that 4:1 majority in this country.

Another great Frenchman, Poincaré—

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Who?

Sir Peter Tapsell: If my hon. Friend has not heard of Poincaré, he had better start studying European history, as he is so keen on Europe.

Poincaré summarised the situation for his own time and for ours when he said:

"The trouble with the Germans is that there are 30 million too many of them."

The existence of the iron curtain and the menacing threat of Russian communism masked that reality for 45 years after the second world war. But with the reunification of Germany, that ethnic, geographic and historic fact has again inevitably moved back centre stage, as it did for Voltaire and Poincaré—who, for the benefit of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), whom I greatly congratulate on his well-deserved honour, was the French Prime Minister and leader after the Versailles treaty. I am sorry that my Lincolnshire French accent is not as good as my hon. Friend's Kentish accent.

Chancellor Kohl is a good man, but he is also a good German. He is about to unveil a statue of Bismarck, whom he greatly admires—as I would if I were German. Kohl does not believe in blood and iron, but he does believe in the international aims of Bismarckism. Bismarck wanted Germany to enjoy in peace what it had won by war; Kohl wants Germany to enjoy in peace what it lost by war. They have the same ambition for Germany to be the senior partner in the European business, as my friends in central Europe all tell me when I visit them on my business travels.

After 1871, Bismarckism worked well until the Germans, or the Kaiser, "dropped the pilot". One day, Germany—or God—will drop Kohl. He, good man that he is, is fearful of the deluge that may come after him. He, if not my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East, is unsure of German moderation in the future. The whole European debate now really centres on the choice of the umbrella most suitable to keep us dry against that possible future deluge.

Chancellor Kohl argues quite openly that German moderation, and European peace and prosperity, can be assured in the coming century only by the inextricable involvement of German political institutions and German business interests with those of adjoining European countries, and most particularly with France, in order to avoid, especially, a fourth terrible Franco-German war. [Interruption.] If Chancellor Kohl talks openly about those matters, as he does, there is no reason for my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East to go on sniggering at that particular point in my speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am afraid that the 10 minutes are up.

7.42 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The House may be relieved to learn that I do not intend to refight the last two world wars, although I am sure that Chancellor Kohl will be pleased to learn that the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) described him as a good German.

To a large extent—understandably—the debate has been dominated by the beef issue. I want, however, to concentrate on some aspects of our relationships with the European Union. There has been a good deal of media comment in the past few months that the number of Labour critics of Maastricht exceeds the number of Conservative critics, and that may have led to a growing feeling that there are more anti-Europeans—if that is the right description—among Labour Members than among Conservatives. It is confusing and misleading, however, to lump together all Labour critics of Maastricht as anti-EU.

I personally have considerable reservations about moves towards too much further integration. I have said that on other occasions, and no doubt I shall express my views in future debates, but a number of my hon. Friends who voted against Maastricht on every occasion are by no means of the same opinion. Indeed, some of those who went into the No Lobby to vote against Maastricht would describe themselves as federalists, going much further. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) is one of them. It is nonsense to say that Labour critics of Maastricht are all in the anti-European camp.

Although, as I have said, I am critical of substantial moves towards more European integration that certainly would not have the support of the British electorate—all the indications at this stage are that they would not—I have nothing in common with some of the Tory critics of the European Union. I am not necessarily referring to the hon. Member for East Lindsey, or to the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), who I believe wishes to speak and for whom I have considerable respect, when I listen to some of the Tory critics of Maastricht and the European Union, I see in them all that I dislike in politics. I see in them and their supporters little Englanders, backward-looking petty nationalists with an intense dislike of foreigners—although no doubt they will tell us that they go abroad for their holidays.

I know that my views are very different indeed from those of the people I have just described. Those Tory critics are the strongest opponents of the social chapter, viewing it as though it were the plague. I am in favour of the social chapter, and I hope that one of the first actions of a Labour Government will be to see that it is implemented in Britain.

They are also the strongest opponents of a minimum wage. I am not necessarily saying that Conservative Euro-enthusiasts are all in favour of it—I do not know—but certainly the Tory critics of the European Union seem to be the most determined opponents of any form of minimum wage, and time and again show indifference to poverty and deprivation both in Britain and abroad. Since I entered politics so many years ago, I have always been suspicious of people who wrap themselves in the Union Jack and give the impression that they are super-patriotic, while repeatedly showing indifference to those in greater social need.

As I said in an intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), I thought that the speech made by the Secretary of State for Defence at the Tory party conference was vulgar and deeply offensive. It reinforced my feeling that I do not agree with Tory critics of the EU on so many issues. My immediate reaction was shame: I was ashamed that a Tory Cabinet Minister could make such a speech and be applauded at the Tory party conference—and the Prime Minister was on the platform, more or less nodding in agreement. I did not think that that time would ever come. Can we imagine a Labour Minister making such a speech? Even when we had a different policy on the European Union, which some of my hon. Friends disliked intensely—it was very different from our current policy—I do not remember any such vulgar or offensive speech about foreigners at the Labour party conference. I think that my hon. Friends will agree.

One of the ironies about Maastricht and the European Union is that, while Labour critics of Maastricht protested at the convergence criteria on public spending and related matters, on issues discussed earlier so eloquently by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore)—that was one of the main reasons why we went into the No Lobby—the Tory critics held the diametrically opposite view on public spending. They are the most ardent and enthusiastic advocates of public spending cuts.

I recently asked the Library what was Britain's current budget deficit. It amounts to 6 per cent. As we know, the Maastricht treaty lays down a figure of 3 per cent. The Library informs me that, to meet the criterion for Government borrowing set out so firmly in the treaty, a cut of some £20 billion would be necessary. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said earlier, that would undoubtedly mean substantial cuts in public expenditure.

I find it difficult to understand why the Governments responsible for Maastricht should have placed such dogmatic emphasis on figures that will mean not dealing with poverty and social deprivation in member states, including Britain. Why did they not include criteria about moves towards full employment and about tackling mass unemployment? The latest figures have been much quoted, but the Library figures reveal that official unemployment in EU member states is more than 18 million. Does what has happened in Europe demonstrate how careful we must be about mass unemployment and the ugly political creatures who thrive on such misery, poverty and deprivation? Some of those movements have been emerging in Europe. We need policies that are different from those laid down in the Maastricht treaty. That is why I have been so critical of it.

When anti-German feeling was referred to, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) quoted those disgusting articles, I thought not only of the German victims of Nazism, but of what happened last Saturday. Were they not Germans? As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said, they were protesting against what I am speaking about, and against the policies in the Maastricht treaty that the German Government want to implement.

The treaty's criteria to cut public spending and all the rest of it are a direct incitement to the Government, who use them as an excuse—not that they necessarily need one. When they want to cut public spending, they say, "We must do so; it is part of the Maastricht treaty and of achieving convergence," even though they do not intend at the moment to go into the European monetary union. Those negative views are not necessarily shared by all the most Euro-enthusiastic hon. Members, but they deeply worry me.

I want a Europe where unemployment is being dealt with. I do not want to see the misery of more than 18 million people out of work—the official figure, but there are probably more. That is why we must give much further consideration to the matter, although not to our EU membership. I voted against that in 1975, but I accept that we are in and that we will remain in. I want, however, different policies to aid people in Europe, and I shall continue to campaign with my hon. Friends on those lines.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), because he shows why the public become confused about the messages that are sent out by the parties and by colleagues. In this debate about our involvement in Europe, we must recognise that, since we first became heavily involved with the single market and the Maastricht treaty, the public have become more doubtful in some areas. People think that the country is becoming more involved in what they believe is likely to lead to a super-federal state.

We need to consider the matter in perspective. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) referred to Mr. Kohl. In his recent speech in Louvain, he said:

> "The question of war and peace in the 21st century really hinges on the progress of European integration."

The stupid nationalist and xenophobic press and other hon. Members interpreted that to mean that we had either to accept Mr. Kohl's views about Europe or have a war and be left out.

I took another view of it. Mr. Kohl was not threatening us with war or a federal European state. As one of the same generation who experienced world war two, I can say that his speech contained no threat. It echoed Winston Churchill's speech, just after the war, at Zurich, where he said:

"We must build a kind of United States of Europe".

He and Mr. Kohl called on us to put behind us our old enmities, not just to end the Franco-German rivalry, but to build a new Europe that would make war between European nations impossible, and that would help to build security and stability in the whole of Europe. The generation who suffered the bloodbath of the 1914-18 war welcomed those noble aspirations, as I do now, and we should not lose sight of that.

The Chancellor's insistence, however, on a federal solution—I use a British context to this—cuts across the grain of much of the British experience of pragmatism and our aspirations and interpretations of Parliament's role. To me and the Government, the national Parliament remains the central focus of democratic legitimacy. That view is contained in the Government's White Paper.

The danger to Europe is that, in our efforts to build the bridge of unity, we will replicate the federal institutions that were adopted in the United States. If we move too quickly, as the United States did—after 80 years, it broke out into civil war—we will retard rather than progress the purpose that we seek to promote in Europe. The founding fathers of that great country experienced that difficulty, and we are hung up on it ourselves. We all know that, unless we handle it carefully, one country after another will, either by force of economic circumstances or reluctantly, be dragged into a super-state. They will resent the encroaching burden of bureaucracy and view it with suspicion, as do Norway and Denmark.

If we put the matter to a vote in a public referendum, the enthusiasm that is generated by the majority of hon. Members will not be replicated. Enlargement has important implications if we are to fulfil the dream of a stronger, more stable and secure Europe. To enlarge Europe is the first priority of the intergovernmental conference. We must realise that that will not come about by strengthening, through corporate economic solutions, supranational institutions or the erosion of national identity. On the contrary, we need more flexible institutions that can accommodate those countries, so that we do not impose extra social costs on them. We need measures that not only reduce bureaucratic burdens and improve the competitiveness of countries that we hope will join the European Union, but increase prosperity.

Another important priority faces us. We must consider carefully the discussions that will precede the introduction of the single currency. Important and controversial points give genuine grounds for indecision. There is no strong message from either Front-Bench team. My party and the Government say that, if we think it is appropriate, we will have a referendum. The Labour party has yet to make such a commitment.

Recently, the Confederation of British Industry has at least shown greater confidence—certainly the members representing larger companies have—in the value of having a single market and currency. That is refuted by the Institute of Directors. Some trade unions are in favour of a single currency; some are doubtful. Some hon. Members—it would be interesting to know how many—are unequivocally in favour of such a move. It is no wonder, therefore, that the public are worried about the direction in which we are going.

What worries me above all is the tone in which our debates on these issues are held. The trouble is that too much of it is expressed in nationalistic and negative terms, which frequently betray a lack of confidence in our ability to persuade our people. We have to work towards a compromise and a solution with our European friends. Membership of the EU represented acceptance—especially with the introduction of the single market by the then Prime Minister, Mrs. Thatcher—of the creation of supranational institutions.

We must reject proposals that would seriously diminish our national sovereignty; but if we are to make progress, we must accept that economic, political and technological developments make it spurious to pretend that national sovereignty has the substance that it once had. Such developments make it impossible for some nations to have an independent currency or even to survive without joining other nations to protect their economic and financial base. That concept involves not only political and economic matters, but defence arrangements.

Relying on the old concept of national independence runs against the grain of greater unity, just as asking the public to accept a federal solution will restrain the development, strength and stability that can come from greater economic and political co-operation.

The attitude that prevails among many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and outside, makes it more difficult to convey the right message to the public. There are those of us in the House who do not have hang-ups about federation—and there are hon. Members who are warmly disposed to Europe who do.

8.1 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): The relationship between the UK and the rest of the European Union faces a serious crisis, and there is a desperate need for confidence building. I hope and pray that the Florence summit will result in the relationship between our country and other EU member states being rebuilt. Serious national interests are at stake. Britain's future lies firmly in the European Union. The case for that is massive; yet the UK's behaviour for so long places in jeopardy its future interests. I regret—I do not say this in any partisan way—that the Prime Minister cannot deliver the confidence that business interests and the public require.

I was pleased by the speech of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in Bonn on Tuesday, which contained a ray of hope. The position that he adopted was refreshing and in contrast to views expressed in the House and by the Government. My right hon. Friend promised a fresh start in the relationship between Britain and the rest of the EU. If only we can do that, if we win the next general election. My right hon. Friend said at that well attended meeting in Bonn that he wanted Britain to walk tall at the centre of the Community. It was encouraging to hear such remarks, which I interpreted as our leader saying that there will be no two-speed Europe for us, with Britain in the slow lane.

I am thinking of our nation, not in party political terms, when I express the belief that two contrasting positions will be in evidence at the next general election. Labour will be in favour of a constructive relationship with the European Union, whereas—and I do not relish this—the Tories will remain catastrophically divided, isolated and continuing as a force for obstruction with our EU partners. Some speeches made this evening depressed me.

Mr. Dykes: Only one.

Mr. Randall: That is a fair intervention.

A constructive relationship between this country and the EU will lead to a single currency—that is as inevitable as night follows day. Some opinion polls on the single market are confusing and conflicting, but it is regarded by business interests that generate this county's wealth and fund its social policy as a terrific success. It has brought a huge increase in trade levels and great opportunities for business enterprise. The single market is also popular with young people, who are leading us by the nose. It is wonderful the way young people react. The Arthur Andersen study clearly showed huge interest in the single market.

I do not have time to make the case for a single currency, but it is like having a cart without a horse. The single market and a single currency go hand in hand. The attractions to business of currency stability and lower transaction costs are irresistible. Many valid points have been made about the deflationary effect of a single currency and the consequences that inadequate convergence could have for employment. We must ensure that the transition works and does not damage public perception of the EU.

If we believe in the concept of European co-operation, there must be more majority voting on policy where currently we have the veto. Majority voting is a more efficient and democratic way of conducting the governance of Europe. If we develop greater co-operation over foreign policy, which is pillar 2 or 3, the European Union's size and economic strength could make it much more influential. The common agricultural policy must also be reformed.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said in Bonn:

> "I have no doubt at all that Britain's future lies in the European Union and at the centre of its events, not on the sidelines . . . It is demeaning to my country to be reduced to the margins of influence, dragged along querulously behind the vision and drive of others."

I found that very encouraging.

So much has been said about the beef crisis, and I have so little time. It is now quite a political matter, and I believe that Conservative Members have a lot to answer for in the way in which it has been handled. In March we heard the health statement, but there was no preparation for it. We lost time, and there was no co-operation. We sustained much damage to our industry and to our reputation. I do not think that there will be a solution by the time of the next general election or that all the phases will have been gone through. Conservative Members will have a lot to answer for.

I should like to make a few practical and down-to-earth comments about the European Parliament. Not enough is said about the European Parliament, although it is regarded as suspect by many people. The Maastricht treaty contained the new idea of co-decision making. We should give the European Parliament a bit of credit for once and realise that the partnership between the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament has worked extremely well. The partnership gives ordinary people an opportunity to have contact with Members of the European Parliament, who are a part of the decision-making process. In democratic terms, that is good and very encouraging. The European Parliament has the power to block and it has various other powers.

I am afraid that I am out of time. I shall finish by saying that, based on what has happened so far, I believe that there is a very good case for giving the European Parliament budgetary powers and for extending those to compulsory expenditure, so that it can do something to improve the efficiency and budgeting of the common agricultural policy.

8.11 pm

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): I hope that I shall be forgiven if I do not follow the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall), except to say that I have greater trust in our Prime Minister to bring back something from Florence than the hon. Gentleman seems to have, as expressed in his speech. I greatly enjoyed the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell). It drew to my memory that wartime warning of "careless talk costs lives". That warning was used when we were fighting the Germans, and I believe that it may apply to his words.

We must fact the fact that the beef crisis has long been a calamity of indeterminate scientific analysis over natural good sense, but one hopes that the end is now in sight. I join some Opposition Members in doubting the beneficial effects of the non-co-operation policy. Perhaps it has had some influence, but I rather doubt that it has had much. The non-co-operation policy worries me especially as it affects spheres of British interest such as Europol, which is a part of a marvellous British initiative. We seem to think that that can be dismissed in using non-co-operation as a hammer.

I should like to make a point that I do not believe is always admitted by the Government: the European Commission remains the instrument for clearing up the BSE problem. The Commission lifted the ban on beef by-products, and it remains the instrument to sort out warring interests and political differences between nations. I remind the House of the Commission's crucial efforts to win the battle over the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which was led by Britain's very able Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan.

Too often, criticism of the European Union—of what it has achieved and will achieve—hangs on criticisms of its institutions. Too often those who put the greatest faith in institutional values are those who criticise the European Union the loudest. That applies to some of my hon. Friends, the Euro-sceptics. That has been the case particularly with the European Court of Justice, which is the primary European Union institution to apply the rules, to identify those who break them and now—very much under British influence—to apply sanctions to miscreants.

We should welcome the existence of that instrument to ensure that agreements are applied properly and enforced fairly throughout the Union. We have argued for it, and Britain obtained agreement at Maastricht to give it greater powers to apply fines. Rather than arguing that the European Court's powers should be undercut, we should continually remind people that Britain always wants to play by the rules and wants others to do so, too. The European Court is charged with ensuring that that is done, and it is doing it ever more effectively, as year follows year.

[Mr. Tim Rathbone]

The advantages of a single market of 340 or so million people are self-evident, with ever freer movement of people, goods, services and capital. To work properly, the single market must have common rules—not intrusive rules, which they do not have to be and should not be—that are properly enforced and evenly applied. That is the function of the European Court.

I agree with Ministers that we should maintain pressure to improve the workings of the European Court of Justice, as we are working to improve the workings of the Council of Europe's European Court of Human Rights. But let us beware of arguments advocating political control for such bodies, as that would mean politics overriding the rule of law, which is as inappropriate in an international context as it is in the British context. Sooner or later, such control would also run contrary to Britain's interests, both commercially and politically. That is not to say that there are no shared political interests between Britain and our partners in Europe—of course there are.

The European Union is not only a free trade area. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) pointed out, it never has been and never will be only a free trade area. For any nation aspiring to influence and leadership in the world—as Britain does and, I hope, always will—a position outside the European Union would prove untenable, even while enjoying the free market advantage of being within the European Economic Area. Britain left a free trade area to join a political community which gains its momentum by embracing free trade. That is the way round. Other nations have followed, and still others are knocking on the door. Europe's prosperity and even its security depend on a continuing drive towards an enlarged European Union. In that, Britain must continue to give a lead.

Just as British influence in Europe over the years is now being felt among our European partners, is it not peculiar that so many voices in Parliament and elsewhere—including in the media, as other hon. Members have pointed out—preach Europhobia? Those voices show such lack of confidence in Britain's ability successfully to negotiate or make deals within the European Union, which runs in the face of history and our achievements in Europe and elsewhere, where we have negotiated and won the argument so successfully.

We must continue to take pride in our roots and our track record and to draw strength and confidence from them. To withdraw under the hypothetical threat that others may set rules or establish an unreliable agenda hardly advances the British cause. The Euro-sceptical view would deny us any influence on events as they unfurl now or in the future. That would be to abdicate our future and to deny our rights of influence rather than to protect them. Rather, I believe that we should work closely with our European partners and with other countries to protect and embrace our mutual best interests, influencing for the better the character and structure of the partnerships with countries in the European Union and elsewhere to which we are committed.

We must continue to argue for evolution within the European Union which aligns with British interests and with our agenda, to include deregulation and openness. We must continually point out that the centralism inherent in too much of the thinking in Europe must lead to more rather than fewer meddling approaches from Brussels.

The speech of one Opposition Member injected a political accent, and I should like to follow that for a moment. I believe that the true Conservative vision for Europe, as deployed by the Prime Minister, is right for Britain. That is a Europe committed to free trade, market solutions and flexible labour markets. It is a Europe of nations, but not of bureaucracy; it is a Europe enlarged, but not rigid. The rest of the European Union needs Britain's Conservative voice to put that case, which in recent years has gained more and more support from other European member states. That voice has to be heard and responded to positively. We must employ persuasion, not perpetual brinkmanship. In an uncertain world, there is strength in working closer together, and there will be benefits for everyone in Britain if we succeed.

The Labour and Liberal Democrat vision of Europe is too often a negative one. It spells a weak Britain in an inward-looking European super-state where jobs are destroyed and enterprise is crushed. The Conservative vision is a positive one. It is a strong Britain in a strong, outgoing Europe with jobs and prosperity as our priorities. That is the way to build on the economic success of the European Community and to help consolidate peace in our continent. I believe that that is the importance of this and any other debate on the European Union—and may we have more of them.

8.21 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I want to comment on an issue that has not yet been mentioned—the application for membership of the European Union made by the Republic of Cyprus. That country has long historic links with the United Kingdom and we are one of the guarantor powers. I should declare my interest as chairman of the Commonwealth parliamentary Cyprus group. Whenever I talk about Cyprus, I mention two commitments, as do other hon. Members on both sides of the House who are involved with Cyprus. We believe in the total sovereignty of the Republic of Cyprus and we believe in the rights and the security of Cypriots, be they Greek or Turkish Cypriots.

I do not think that anyone would dispute that Cyprus, with its traditions and democracy, is part of Europe. That is why many hon. Members fully support its application for membership. Discussion on its application took place some years ago. In January 1992, the European Parliament agreed to establish a Cyprus joint parliamentary committee. At a meeting of that committee in November 1994, a recommendation was sent to the European Parliament, the Council of the European Union and the European Commission that enlargement of the EU should involve Cyprus and Malta. At a meeting in Nicosia in April 1995, that same committee adopted a recommendation which stressed:

"an unsuccessful outcome to the talks held under the auspices of the United Nations Secretary-General for a solution to the Cyprus problem should in no way constitute an obstacle to Cyprus's membership of the European Union."

It is because of that commitment that I wish to take part in the debate.

What concerns me and many other hon. Members is that we are increasingly hearing that the application of Cyprus will depend on whether there has been a settlement to the long-running tragedy that has existed there since the invasion by Turkey in 1974. Such a condition was never mentioned or sought to be imposed before and many of us wonder why a change is taking place. I and many other hon. Members were concerned that, at a recent meeting of the friends of Cyprus group—the chairman of that group is Lord Bethell from the other place—comments such as that were made by the Foreign Secretary.

I and many other hon. Members want a settlement to the long-running tragedy in Cyprus. I suggest that people read the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. He will leave no one in any doubt about who he blames for the lack of a settlement to that long-running tragedy. It is certainly not the Republic of Cyprus or its Government.

For several years there has been a close relationship between Cyprus and the European Economic Community. Report after report has praised the impressive record of Cyprus' economy and stressed its eligibility to become a member of the Community. Over the years, the Government of Cyprus have set up some 20 committees, in co-operation with the European Parliament, to look at specific issues that would face Cyprus as it becomes more involved in the European Community. Those committees have covered company law, free movement of capital, foreign and security policy, taxation, the environment, industrial policy, enterprise policy and many other matters.

In June 1994, at its meeting in Corfu, the European Council discussed Cyprus and said:

"An essential stage of Cyprus' preparation for accession can now be regarded as completed."

That statement was confirmed by the European Community at its meeting in Essen in December 1994.

That is the background to what has happened in recent years to Cyprus's application for membership of the European Union. Many hon. Members are concerned that conditions are beginning to be imposed and that one of the countries seeking to impose them, is, sadly, Britain and the British Government. The application for membership of the European Union should be based solely on the criteria for membership and on no other issue.

President Clerides of the Republic of Cyprus has repeatedly asked the Turkish Cypriots to work with him to form the basis of the application that the Republic of Cyprus is now seeking to see pursued after the IGC. Sadly, we know that the economy of northern Cyprus is in a deplorable condition. Thousands of Turkish Cypriots are leaving northern Cyprus because they are depressed and see no future for themselves or their families. There is no doubt that membership of the EU would benefit the whole of that country and its people.

I hope that this evening we will have a clear statement from the Minister and from the Opposition Front-Bench spokesperson that under no circumstances will Turkey have any veto on Cyprus's application. Turkey seems to think that it will have a right of veto, and it should be told clearly by one of the guarantor powers for the island of Cyprus that it will have none. I hope that we will hear that loud and clear from both Front Benches.

The recent history of Cyprus has been one of tragedy. All of us who are involved with Cyprus want a settlement for the benefit of the republic and of the people who live there. Many of us believe that the future for the island of Cyprus is via its membership of the European Union, which will bring stability, security and, without doubt, prosperity to that country. I hope that Cyprus's application will be supported by all parties represented in the House, and that, when it is tabled, the British Parliament will be at the forefront in supporting it.

8.30 pm

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I agree with the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) that Cyprus belongs to Europe and should be in the European Union—but so should some 24 other countries that equally belong to Europe. Some of our Euro-enthusiasts have argued today for a single currency. They told us that we cannot repatriate the common agricultural policy or anything else. I put to them one simple point—how can we bring in Cyprus and the other 24 countries that belong to Europe, just as much as we do, if we try to enforce single policies on no fewer than 40 countries?

The newspapers were rather maligned in the earlier part of our debate, but they made one forecast that has proved to be correct—that the Euro-enthusiasts on the Conservative Benches would be out in full force in this debate to repudiate the Euro-sceptics. They have indeed turned out—every one of them—and made the case for little Europe. They think of Europe as just 15 countries. [Interruption.] Oh, yes. They argue for a single currency and all the policies that may just work, but only just, for 15 countries, but could never work for 40 if we want to bring into Europe countries such as Ukraine and Russia, which belong to Europe just as much as we do. It is unthinkable. I fear that even my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), with whom I try to agree on these occasions, is a little European. His Europe is but a mere part of our continent.

Hon. Members have spoken of the massive case for our membership of Europe and cited economic facts. I draw their attention to the first full cost-benefit analysis of our membership of the European Union. After 20 years, it is right that some objective study should be made. The study was sponsored by a number of industrialists and reported in last week's European Business Review.

The survey's conclusion is that, although there are advantages to our membership, it is fairly evenly balanced or, indeed, slightly adverse so far—but it says that, if we embark upon the social chapter and a single currency, it will be categorically adverse. I commend to the House someone who contributed to that report, Noriko Hama—who is the chief economist at the Mitusishi Institute and probably advises more Japanese investors in this country than anyone else—who said that, in or out, this will always be the best country in Europe for Japanese and other foreigners to invest in.

She gave some powerful arguments for that view—not just the obvious one that we speak the English language, just as all Japanese business men do—including the fact that we take a much less chauvinistic attitude towards the Japanese when they want to invest and set up factories in this country; that we are not so regulated; and that we are much more welcoming than other countries. I commend to hon. Members what she said and also the other conclusions in that important report, which is the first detailed, sophisticated study of the economic advantages and disadvantages of our membership of the EU.

[Sir Richard Body]

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) spoke passionately about unemployment. It is outrageous that 18 million—and rising—people are out of work. Some people say that the number will be 20 million quite soon. Yet around the world unemployment is going down. It is going down in Britain. In parts of western Europe that are outside the European Union there is no unemployment problem. For example, in Switzerland and Norway, unemployment is non-existent. We must ask ourselves whether the European Union is trailing its feet over an employment policy while other countries throughout the world are getting over the problem of unemployment and not suffering to the same degree.

Economists say that there is a distinct correlation between the size of a market or an integrated economy and the size of the problems—the larger the market, the larger the problems. They say that in a large single market the mega-corporations tend to be the biggest investors and the most powerful elements and that they prefer to invest in capital projects rather than in what economists call labour, but what we call people. If that is true, it is an indictment of the way in which any large single economy works. Several hon. Members became quite lyrical on the subject, but I hope that they will consider some of the arguments being advanced by some of our foremost economists in both the academic and business worlds.

It is rather notable that an educational charity has been seeking an economist of some distinction to argue the economic merits of our continued membership of the European Union and a single currency, but has so far failed to recruit anyone willing to undertake that task. We must put to one side, or at least moderate, the euphoria that has been generated so eloquently and forcefully over the years by many of my right hon. and hon. Friends that it is now catching on among Opposition Members.

Some of my hon. Friends are rather patronising to us Euro-sceptics. None of us likes being patronised; I certainly do not. More than 40 years ago, way back in 1955, I signed the first early-day motion on what we call Europe. It was signed by just a few hon. Members and it urged the Government of the time to be at Messina and play their part in drafting what became the treaty of Rome. I well remember what the then Patronage Secretary, who now sits this side of the Gangway, had to say to us about that EDM. We were just a tiny band and we were rather federalist-minded. I fear that they are now all dead, or certainly retired, as I am the only survivor in the House.

I hope that my hon. Friends do not become too patronising towards those of us who have been arguing about Europe for so long—in my case, originally arguing in favour of membership. The world is moving on—if I may say so and make a very banal point—and so is Europe. We are not talking of the Europe of the 1960s or the 1970s. We must now look forward to a Europe in which all 40 countries may play a part. That is why I hope that, at Florence, we shall take some steps to make the Community a more flexible, looser arrangement so that those countries, which are just as European as we are, may be allowed to play a part.

8.39 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) shares with his right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) the classic ability of Members of Parliament to make a good speech without notes. Unfortunately, I cannot follow them to that extent, but I share with them, having been around before, during and after the war, a passionate belief in European internationalism as a means of preventing successive disasters such as those that we had experienced.

Where I disagree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup is on the means he has chosen. He and his generation saw to it that Europe was saved from disaster. We owe a debt to those who went to war as well as to those who died. However, I believe that the right hon. Gentleman, whom I shall mention at length this evening, has chosen the wrong vehicle—provably so. I mentioned to him that I intended to make these remarks. He has to go to his constituency this evening, and I understand that, of course.

The test case is the fisheries. We are to have a cut of approximately 40 per cent. in our fishing ability; that is part of the European Community's responsibility. During the debates of 19 December last, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was attacked by Conservative Members for having given away the fishermen's rights. The right hon. Gentleman said:

"There is no truth whatever in that statement. The principle was laid down by Act of Parliament, as were all principles. However, the policies to be followed were not laid down, and there was no common fisheries policy at that time—nor was one being discussed."

He was referring to the period 1971-72.

I believe that the right hon. Gentleman is sincere in his desires, but I fear that, as with all of us, his memory is sometimes not as accurate as it might be. The principle, of course, was not laid down by Act of Parliament; it was laid down in successive regulations and existing treaties of the European Community. They laid down fisheries as a common resource. Indeed, our relationship to that fisheries policy was published only after the great vote on the White Paper, when article 103 of the revised treaty laid down the arrangements. They were not known at the time of the big vote on the principle. In any case, as I shall show, those arrangements were not included in an Act of Parliament.

The right hon. Gentleman said last December:

"there was no common fisheries policy at that time—nor was one being discussed."—[Official Report, 19 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1360.]

However, in July 1971, before the accession treaty, the right hon. Gentleman's Government published a White Paper. Paragraph 152, headed "Fisheries", said:

"we do not consider the common fisheries policy, decided upon at the time our negotiations began, to be appropriate to the needs and circumstances of an enlarged Community".

So it must have been a policy. The White Paper then said:

"further discussions will be held in the near future. The Government are determined to secure arrangements which will be fair throughout the enlarged Community and will satisfactorily safeguard the interests of British fishermen."

Why were the existing arrangements unsatisfactory? The reason was that a regulation laid down the principle of a common resource, although that may not have been within the terms of the treaty, and arrangements for the common resource would be decided by qualified majority voting. We know of the difficulties that that brings.

If the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup were here, I would tell him that there was very much a common policy. What he said then, alas, was not carried out. Safeguards were not inserted in the arrangements, although at a Conservative party conference earlier, the Government said that they would be.

On 19 December 1995, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"My actions were not secretive; I have a record in my own papers. The principle was published, and it was open for debate in the House."

It was published only after the right hon. Gentleman had signed the treaty. On the matter of open debate in the House, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"We debated our proposed entry into the Community day after day in both Houses of Parliament."—[Official Report, 19 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1361.]

There were statements about the fisheries, but there was no debate.

It is extraordinary that the discussions on the European Communities Act 1972 did not feature any debate on fisheries. The relevant amendment was ruled out of order on 22 June 1972. The then Chairman of the Committee, in an unprecedented remark, ruled it out of order, saying:

"It is depressing but nevertheless true."—[Official Report, 22 June 1972; Vol. 839, c. 737.]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) had said that, unless we debated the amendment, we would not debate fisheries at all. I fear, therefore, that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was also inaccurate in that respect.

On 19 December 1995, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"Therefore, it is a lie to say that we were secretive and held back information from the House."—[Official Report, 19 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1361.]

Unfortunately, I again challenge that statement as not being strictly correct—indeed, I believe that it is incorrect by a long way. When the fishing arrangements were finally agreed by Lord Rippon, he made statements in the House that suggested that any arrangement that had been made, as it had been, for a 10-year temporary arrangement for the fisheries provided that, when it finished on 31 December 1982, it would be subject to wide and unanimous agreement.

In the House of Lords, Lady Tweedsmuir twice said that that was the case. I do not have time to read the quotation because of the 10-minute rule, but it is stated clearly. That was untrue, because, in the treaty and in the other documents, it was clear that fisheries arrangements would be subject to qualified majority voting. That was pointed out by the late Lord Jay on 20 January 1972, when he said:

"The Chancellor has misrepresented the facts to this House and to the fishing industry. In saying categorically in the other place on 14th. December that we have a veto, the noble Lady was guilty of a direct falsehood."—[Official Report, 20 January 1972; Vol. 829, c. 731.]

I believe that I have demonstrated by those brief quotations that the right hon. Gentleman's memory in that respect was inaccurate.

The Norwegian press published, during the period of the negotiations, a letter from the right hon. Gentleman to Mr. Bratteli, the Norwegian Prime Minister, saying:

"It is very important for us that we present this question in a manner that will appear satisfactory to our fishing interests."

Unfortunately, Mr. Bratteli still went ahead and as a result, his Fisheries Minister resigned. That had a big effect on the subsequent referendum in Norway.

I have summarised the situation accurately, I believe. The right hon. Gentleman will no doubt read what I have said and look at the documents that I shall send to him. I have respect for the right hon. Gentleman, for being of a generation who made discussion of these matters possible and who made it possible for us to be here in freedom, but I believe that he has chosen the wrong vehicle. The fact that the fisheries arrangements had to happen to get us into the EC, the fact that we now have friction in our fisheries arrangements, the fact that there is a crisis in the industry and the fact that there are fish wars show that the machinery is not working.

I believe that the treaties are not the right vehicle for us to achieve what we all want—a peaceful, prosperous and equitable Europe of all nations, as the hon. Member for Holland with Boston said, in the next few years and in the centuries to come. I ask the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup to admit that he has chosen the wrong vehicle to attain those ends.

8.48 pm

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): The European fisheries policies have always been perfectly clear. If the common fisheries policy did not exist, it would have to be invented. The propensity of fishermen to over-fish, the need for conservation and the fact that fish do not take account of international territorial waters mean that we need international collaboration, and that is what the common fisheries policy should and does offer. That does not mean that it should not be changed, but the basis of its existence must be accepted, even by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

Our debates on Europe tend to be setpieces between accustomed actors, among whom I include myself and the hon. Member for Newham, South. We go through the regular routine of the "pros" and the "antis" and we hear the views of both sides. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) has almost put himself in the anti-European category, according to my definition of it. I heard what he said about a Europe of 40, but that is not what we are talking about. We are talking about a working community. There are also the much-discussed Euro-sceptics.

I am delighted that the balance of the debate, which has continued for nearly four hours, is so strongly in favour of those who take a constructive and positive approach to Europe. Those in the other camp—as we well know, and has been demonstrated again this evening, they are on both sides of the Chamber—fall into two categories: the clear anti-Europeans and the Euro-sceptics. The anti-Europeans are few in number, but they have two qualities that they can pray in aid: first, their consistency, as most of them have been consistently opposed to Britain's membership of the European Community for 20 or 30 years; and secondly, their honesty, as they say what they believe. That is in sad distinction to many Euro-sceptics, who share the view that they wish Britain to be out of the European Union, but shy away from actually saying so. Instead, they resort to the use of the word "sceptics".

Sceptical means doubtful or unconvinced, but Euro-sceptics are not in the least doubtful. Most are convinced that we should be out of the union, but they simply do not dare say so. They know that even now, despite the barrage of anti-European propaganda to which the public have been subjected, the great majority of the electorate is where it was at the time of the 1975 referendum—a 2:1 majority in favour of Britain remaining in Europe.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker), who has joined us for the first time today. If he listens quietly, perhaps he will learn something for a change. It is nice to have him here, even at this late hour.

Even if we take Euro-scepticism at face value, what a negative position it is. What on earth does it mean? We are all sceptical about a great many things, but surely it is the duty of politicians to support or advocate a policy. We are well accustomed to negativism or scepticism in the media, and we rightly complain about it, but we seek from politicians the positive advocacy of a policy. What are Euro-sceptics positive about? Instead, they exaggerate and magnify every silly grumble—and some not so silly—about the European Union. We hear a great deal about square tomatoes, straight bananas and silly rules about slaughterhouses. We hear diatribes about the great spectre of the hegemony of Germany that will attempt to dominate and control us and use every manoeuvre to achieve what it failed to achieve in two world wars. We are told that 13 other ancient European nations are voluntarily rolling over or being hoodwinked to accept German domination. That is total myth, and they know it.

Another myth is that we thought that we were only joining a free trade area. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) and my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) have touched on that. It was always perfectly clear that it would be more than a free trade area.

When the Common Market started in 1958, for all those historical, geographical and cultural reasons, Britain did not join at Messina. I was interested to hear what my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said about his views on Messina at the time. It was a great missed opportunity of our political forebears. Instead, we said, "Let us form a free trade area." Within two years, we realised that that was not adequate, and by July 1961, Britain, under a Conservative Government, was applying to join the European Community because we knew exactly what was at stake and that that was what was needed.

All the extra benefits of the European Community have always been perfectly clear, as has the background of the failure of the European Free Trade Area. Baroness Thatcher has been quoted, in what she said about the European Community in 1975. Nine years later, in June 1984, she addressed the memorandum to her fellow Heads of Government that called for "a series of new policies to promote the economic, social and political growth" of the European Community. She stressed that it must be the objective

"to aim beyond the common commercial policy through political co-operation towards a common approach to external affairs" and to strengthen European defence co-operation. So any serious politician who claims that he thought that we were only joining a free trade area has many questions to answer.

The benefits of the membership of the European Union are manifold. Although we need to develop the common foreign and security policy and make it more effective, it certainly exists. The environmental benefits, international trade, our effectiveness in the Uruguay round of the general agreement on tariffs and trade negotiation and the World Trade Organisation have been mentioned, as have the benefits of the internal market.

In order to use those great benefits properly, we need supranational organisations such as the European Court of Justice. The point has been made, so I shall not dwell on it, but we cannot simply repatriate British laws and have no supranational laws, because we benefit from them. We are great advocates of the single market, and to make that single market work properly, we certainly need a European Court of Justice. It is subject to amendment, as is the European Parliament, but those supranational institutions are absolutely necessary. Those who advocate the so-called withdrawal from or change in those institutions know that it is completely unrealistic. It is another means of disguising their own basic objective, which is that Britain should withdraw from the union.

The White Paper on the IGC, which I believe is a commendable document that tries to stitch our party together, puts that clearly:

"We must be realistic therefore about the sort of changes we can hope to achieve at the IGC, just as we are clear about the sort of changes we will not accept. If we were to press ideas which stand no chance of general acceptance, some others would seek to impose an integrationist agenda which would be equally unacceptable from our point of view."

That is precisely what too many hon. Members, including some of my hon. Friends, are trying to do. They know clearly that what they advocate would lead to Britain's departure. All those claims about repatriation, and about seeking to change the fundamental essentials of the treaties of Rome and of Maastricht would break up the European Union, greatly to the detriment of Britain and of our British national interests.

It is encouraging that tonight the strong weight of argument has been against the anti-Europeans and the Euro-sceptics. I am afraid that that campaign will have to continue, because the time for turning the other cheek and trying to patch things up is over. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday, we can gain tremendous benefits from being part of Europe, and Britain's place—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

8.58 pm

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Earlier today, I intervened during the Foreign Secretary's speech, and I was a bit surprised that when he responded to me, he did not point out the fact that

"All member states had imposed or announced bans" on this country's beef

"before the Union acted"

collectively.

Those are not my words, but those of David Williamson, the Secretary-General of the European Commission, in an article that appeared in the Financial Times on 10 June. I hope that Ministers will read that article, which says a lot of sensible things about the damage the non-co-operation policy is doing to our country and to Europe as a whole.

Unfortunately, I do not have time to go into detail about the beef crisis, but it is worth pointing out that none of the 21 countries that imposed a ban on our beef before the European Union action will make any financial contribution to the British farmers affected by their ban, whereas the European Union is providing financial support. No doubt that means that, in the Daily Express and the Daily Mail—owned by the people who were referred to by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath)—the European Union will be denounced for doing so.

I intend to concentrate on economic and monetary union. The Confederation of British Industry has produced a little leaflet as part of its "Business in Europe" campaign, which includes the following important statement:

"Even if the UK does not join, it is in the UK's interests that EMU is a success."

The House of Lords European Communities Committee has published in the past few days a report entitled "An EMU of 'Ins' and 'Outs'", which says:

"We are convinced that it is prudent for the United Kingdom to plan on the basis that EMU will go ahead, whether or not the United Kingdom eventually joins."

Perhaps that is why the Chancellor of the Exchequer has quietly persuaded his fellow Finance Ministers to drop the requirement for two years' membership of the ERM before a country can join EMU. He is keeping his options open. I am not sure whether the rest of the Cabinet are entirely satisfied or happy with that, but at least the Government seem to be preparing the ground.

EMU is not a problem for our Government alone. If and when it takes place, it will happen because there is now a momentum behind it. The markets have already made the adjustments. In the financial institutions, it is assumed that there will be a European single currency within the next few years. There may be some slippage of a few months in the implementation date, but we should not hold our breath. It is clear that EMU will happen at some point, and as a country we are sleepwalking away from the real questions.

The debate today has been of an infinitely better quality than some of the European debates in the House. I congratulate the Conservatives who have come along and made their voices heard in favour of European co-operation for a change. Sometimes it has been a bit sad, and we have got the impression that there is no one but rabid xenophobes on the Government Benches.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (South Derbyshire): It is not for want of trying.

Mr. Gapes: I exempt the hon. Lady, who always attends European debates.

I have a serious point to make about where we are going. Clearly the single currency will be centred on the deutschmark. There is already a deutschmark zone. If we choose to stay out of that, it will probably be at the cost of our having to meet the convergency criteria anyway, so as to be competitive in international markets. I was in Oslo recently, and the Norwegians are meeting the single market criteria more rigorously than most member states of the EU, even though they voted to stay out. They are doing so because they recognise that their economy depends on getting into the European market. If we do not face up to this problem in the next few years, we could face some harsh decisions.

Our country is now at a watershed, and we must stop the uncertainty. We must recognise that we have to make some decisive choices soon. I have been against referendums, and I tended to the view of Clement Attlee that they were the devices of demagogues and dictators. But we must make decisive choices, and we need a general election soon that gives a clear choice to the people of this country. We will do ourselves enormous damage if we spend another year of incessant agonising about our future and do not face up to the fundamental economic and political problems of a wider Europe, such as enlargement. This country must stop looking inwards and start looking to the wider world.

9.5 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (South Derbyshire): I am hoping for two helpful announcements following the Florence summit: first, that the framework document on BSE will be adopted and implemented, as other hon. Members have said today; and, secondly, that the non-co-operation strategy will be abandoned and consigned to the dustbin of history where it belongs. The two elements are linked by the Government, and the latter strategy has been regarded as the cause of the former.

Earlier today, a triumph was claimed by the Government, and who am I to argue with that? I merely put on record a point that I made to the Foreign Secretary when he came to speak to the Conservative group for Europe, of which I am chairman, on 12 June in the House. In my view, had we adopted the framework approach from the start, we would have arrived at much the same point by now without the non-co-operation process. If negotiation, scientific evidence and everything else that we have called in aid are as strong and important as we believe them to be, the obduracy and bad manners of the non-co-operation process would not have been necessary.

Some things are very obvious from the position paper of the Commission, entitled "The Protection of Human and Animal Health". It is very clear, for example, that the European Union holds the whip hand in this. The document states:

"Fortnightly reports by the UK and inspections and monthly reports by the Commission to the Council and Parliament"— not this Parliament, but the European Parliament—

"will continue as long as necessary and are an integral part of this procedure".

The document adds:

"The Commission will subsequently fix the date when exports can effectively resume following a successful outcome of a Community inspection".

My goodness—that puts us in our place.

It has also become obvious that we cannot manage without the EU. These countries are our customers. The hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) said that the countries banned our exports before the EU did so, and he is quite right. However, it was worse than that. Our customers banned our exports. The day after the announcement by the Secretary of State for Health—I am glad that he made it in the House—the markets in Derbyshire and Staffordshire closed. My constituents, and my beef farmers in particular, had a lucrative trade with Italy, but they have been unable to export anything—not a single gramme or ounce—since.

[Mrs. Edwina Currie]

These countries are our customers, but they are also our regulators—there can be no argument about that any more. They are also our competitors and, close as we are, they are our companions in every aspect of business. What is also beyond peradventure is that enormous and long-lasting damage has been done to the European beef industry—probably more than to our own. Therefore, we are all very much in this together.

My anxieties have been aroused by much of the debate during the past three months or so. Hon. Members have talked about the damage done to this country's reputation abroad, but I should like to mention how the clumsy handling of this and previous rows has damaged public opinion in this country. When the Prime Minister took office, a Gallup poll in The Daily Telegraph in November 1990 asked a regular question:

"Generally speaking, do you think British membership of the European Union is a good thing, a bad thing or neither good nor bad?"

In November 1990, 56 per cent. said that it was a good thing and 13 per cent. said that it was a bad thing—in other words, about 4:1. Of course, the British are among the few nations who can say that something is a bad thing, but want to stay in it. Nevertheless, at that stage the European Union was very popular. That was the result of a highly successful decade of pro-European activity, culminating in the creation of the single market.

Where are we now? In the same poll in The Daily Telegraph on 10 April 1996, 34 per cent. of respondents said that it was a good thing, 34 per cent. that it was a bad thing and 32 per cent. did not know. So we now have a confused and divided nation. That, I suspect, reflects a confused and divided House, and in particular a confused and divided Administration.

Our Front-Bench speakers repeatedly raise fears about things that do not exist and probably are not going to exist. We constantly hear—it is in the White Paper—that the Government are totally against a super-state and a federal Europe. Those phrases were bandied around by our Ministers long before Sir James Goldsmith appeared on the scene and started using such language.

My right hon. and hon. Friends are raising an Aunt Sally which has no basis in fact. The result is to make the British people fearful not of how the European Union will be in future but of how it is now. We know that the United Kingdom as a trading nation has gained enormously from how the European Union is now. The Government have been making a rod for their own back. That makes it harder to accept change when it inevitably comes. It also makes it harder to accept the implementation of changes agreed many years ago such as the fisheries policy. It just makes life very much harder.

All the surveys show that the British people want more information—information that they can trust, refer to, discuss, debate and evaluate. That should come from the Government. It should not come from anyone else. It should come clearly from the Government, who ought to take on board as a duty their responsibility to educate the nation.

The same report in The Daily Telegraph referred to an effort by Gestetner to discover the attitudes of Britain's school children. It discovered that "sophistication about Europe among Britain's young is not high . . . 39 per cent. thought Europe included the USA and Australia."

The provision of information ought also to be the European Commission's job, but it is extremely hesitant about information campaigns. It has decided not to spend information money in this country, although it spends it in other countries. So the voluntary movements will have to do it. The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) is the chairman of the European Movement. I am a vice-chairman, and other vice-chairmen have been in the Chamber tonight. We will have to do it. We will have to take on Goldsmith. We will do it, but it is a disgrace that it is being left to the voluntary movements. It ought to be the responsibility of the Government.

I have a feeling that the Government think that anti-European or Euro-sceptic policies will be popular with the electorate when the election comes. This is the Redwood theory. It is sadly mistaken. It may go down well in Wokingham, but it does not make voters' eyes light up in the industrial midlands, where large numbers of marginal seats are to be found—seats such as mine. Why? Because the European Union means jobs, that is why, and my young working voters know it. At no time since the war have the British electorate voted into power an anti-European party. The Labour party knows that, which is why, with its most cynical approach to politics, it is now moving in that direction.

More significantly, it is in the Government's interest and the country's interest that we should adopt a much more positive approach in future. I hope, therefore, that we will return in our dealings with the European Union to consent and courtesy as quickly as possible.

9.13 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): In a Chamber in which we extol the virtues of education and maturity, when someone like myself speaks as a pro-European who 20 years ago campaigned against Europe—as did my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition—it is regarded not as a sign of education and growing maturity but as some dark secret that one should try to bury. I was unashamedly naive about Europe and I have, I think, matured and become confident of the benefits that membership of Europe gives to us as a nation and to the people whom I represent.

I listened to the speech of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) and I agree that the original concept of the treaty of Rome was right. Europe should grow closer and closer over the years into a greater unity. We should be unashamed about that, especially as most of us come into politics because, above all, we want peace. We can prioritise the economy, which is very important—the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) spoke about jobs—but we want peace and prosperity and that is why we have built Europe as a bulwark against another war such as the one in 1914-18 and the last war.

We want a peaceful and a prosperous Europe that offers cultural diversity. We should speak out about the good aspects of Europe, and I am glad that we have had a positive debate today. So many of the voices that have been heard in our country in the past two years have been strident, Euro-sceptic voices.

I do not blame the Euro-sceptics. They have an opinion and they have the right to express that opinion, but the Government have been pushed into nervous timidity about Europe. That is the real problem, but I think that they are coming to their senses. I knew they would come to their senses on the day that the CBI spoke out with a clarion message. As someone involved with manufacturing industry, I have gone round and spoken to the chairmen of companies and they have asked quietly—they are more positive now—what the Government's problem is and why they have changed their mind about being at the heart of Europe. That is a consistent point of view and an important one.

I wish to shed a little light into the lives of all those who believe in Europe. Some of the more sophisticated polls show that the new, younger generation, especially those who are well educated, are positive about Europe. We have a wonderful network in Europe in the ERASMUS exchange programme. Young students from across Europe come here to be educated, and our students go abroad. There is a marvellous feeling among the new generation, who are better at languages than we were and better at conversing with their opposite numbers. That is making Europe a reality and is one ingredient that will stop us ever going back to an anti-European position.

Another problem with the issue of Europe is that too often people think that one has to be pro-Europe and unquestioning or anti-Europe. I want to be both. I am pro-European, but there are some ghastly problems with Europe. For example, the common agricultural policy is a disgrace. It must be changed, but we must be in Europe to change it. We cannot change it if we do not participate.

I take the traditional view about a healthy democracy. I do not know of any healthy democracy that does not have a legislature that checks the executive effectively. That has worked in this country and in the great democracies of the world. An effective legislature is the key ingredient, together with an independent judiciary, for a healthy democracy. We do not have that in Europe, because it is far too heavily driven by the executive. The Council of Ministers has too much power—as, in some ways, does the Commission, but that can be put right.

As a Front Bencher shadowing various Ministers in the past 12 years, I have seen the facility with which a Minister would leave the House of Commons, get into his chauffeured car, drive to the City airport or Heathrow, fly to Brussels, and meet his opposite numbers, with a simultaneous translation and another staff provided. The executive has wonderful access to Europe. The Minister shakes his head, but if we want to deepen our European experience and to make the people we represent more confident about Europe, we must start taking it seriously ourselves.

That means that we must talk to our opposite numbers in Germany, France, Spain and Italy. We must have the ability to meet them and talk to them on issues in which we are interested such as energy, the environment or industrial policy. The best way to overcome prejudice is to meet the people that one tends to hold prejudices about. We, the 15 domestic legislatures, have to take steps to make common cause, which is what politicians do best. Politicians are good at gossiping, plotting and planning, and we must start doing that across the 15 domestic parliaments.

The Front-Bench teams have been very good and have allowed Back Benchers to squeeze in extra time, so I shall not detain the House for too much longer.

If we are to start making common cause, we must have access—not the miserable one trip to Brussels a year. We must have a method of communication, a regular page on the Internet and a regular journal or newsletter for hon. Members and for those other legislatures that are still steam driven. We must also demand a meeting place—a central location—perhaps in Brussels, with meeting rooms and simultaneous translation, where we can do the thing that politicians do best: check an executive which, if not controlled, will get out of hand.

I promised myself that I would say nothing about the beef crisis, but I have been tempted by the latter remarks of the hon. Member for South Derbyshire. I was sitting in the House talking to the chairman of a major chemical company three months ago when the crisis broke. When we all thought that it was a quiet week, two Cabinet Ministers rushed into the Chamber to make a statement—indeed, the hands of the Secretary of State for Health were shaking on his papers. The message went round the world that there was a crisis. The senior industrialist said to me, "When we get to a certain level in my business, we are sent on a crisis management course. You are told that, if you do not handle a crisis in 10 minutes or 10 hours, it will get out of hand." The beef crisis got out of hand.

I was with the German ambassador in Paris two weeks ago, when he asked me in a pained way, "What have you done? You have single-handedly undermined one of the most important industries in Europe." If the crisis was in the pharmaceutical, chemical or steel industry, it would look different, but it happened to involve farming and beef. It was this Administration who got things so wrong and forgot that we live in a global village. The image of the Secretary of State at the Dispatch Box was instantly transmitted around the globe, and everything that followed was this Administration's responsibility.

I shall end on a better note: this has been an intelligent and constructive debate. We must ensure that the message that prosperity and peace come from a deepening and widening Europe is broadcast not just today. We must continue to give that message, or the eccentric right in this country will take the initiative and take advantage of the current situation.

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Today's debate has been part of the series of debates that we hold in the House to look at the six-monthly developments in the European Union. Such is the unpredictability of political life that six months ago we did not imagine that we would spend the majority of today's debate discussing a beef crisis. As many hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, it has been a good debate—one of the best of the six-monthly debates that I have experienced during my time in the House, with some excellent contributions from both sides of the House. There have been fewer of the setpieces to which the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) referred, and, given the unusual circumstances, some unusual contributions.

On the Conservative Benches, as was pointed out by many of my hon. Friends, the debate was not dominated by Euro-sceptics. They have not been entirely absent from the debate. There was the perhaps idiosyncratic speech of the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), which provoked plenty of reaction on both sides of the House, and the speech of the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), who said some things with which I agreed, particularly on the common agricultural policy and the need for its reform if enlargement of the EU is to go ahead, as we all hope.

[Ms Joyce Quin]

None the less, there were some notable Euro-sceptic absences in the debate, including that of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). Perhaps he was so wounded by the comments made about him by the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie) in The Times today—I shall not quote them in case they are deemed unparliamentary—that he was rendered speechless and unable to attend. I shall leave to my hon. Friends the joy of discovering those quotes in today's newspapers.

Mr. Bellingham: What about the Labour Members who oppose Europe?

Ms Quin: I do not think that the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) has been present throughout the debate. He certainly has not heard as many of the speeches as I have, so perhaps he will not make comments from a sedentary position.

The beef ban and the Government's approach to beef have been a dominant theme throughout the debate. Indeed, there were many telling criticisms of the Government's approach to the issue. There is, it seems, a depressing pattern in the Government's approach to European Union issues. They breathe fire and brimstone and then subside without achieving their original goals, and often do so in such a way as to damage our standing with our European partners. Indeed, this is the third time in the past couple of years that the Government have adopted such an approach: they did so in the dispute about qualified majority voting, at the Ioanina conference and at the time of the appointment of the European Commission President, where they stuck out against the appointment of Jean Luc Dehaene and ended up with the appointment of Jacques Santer, who then said that his views on European policies were identical to those of Mr. Dehaene, whom the Government had been so determined to resist.

There has been a catastrophic mishandling and mismanagement of the BSE episode and the beef ban by the Government, beginning with deregulation and the laxity of rules on animal feed, which have caused such problems, leading to the extraordinary events, which have been described by many hon. Members, of 20 March, when the Secretary of State for Health made his statement to the House. The statement was made with a staggering lack of consultation with our European partners and it caused many of the problems that have subsequently haunted the Government. I quite accept the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who said that members of the public were surprised that the EU had the power to impose a worldwide ban, but I find it quite astonishing that the Government did not seem to realise that, or that they did not prepare the ground much more fully with our European partners, given the likely reaction by consumers in other European Union countries.

I found the Foreign Secretary's speech an exercise in the rewriting of immediate history. He seemed to think that we had very short memories indeed and that we would not remember what was said in the House only a month or so ago, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) reminded us in vivid detail what the Government said at the beginning of the process, what they claimed then and what they claim today in the House and outside to the media.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): In his speech today, the Foreign Secretary repeatedly made the point that the extra 67,000 cattle that will be slaughtered are not additional, because they will be slaughtered prematurely anyway. But is not that true of all cattle? Otherwise our fields would be filled with small, grey, geriatric cows tottering around on arthritic legs. We do not see that. Is not it true that the additional cows that are being slaughtered are in fact having their productive lives reduced, and that the change of policy is a humiliating climbdown?

Ms Quin: As ever, my hon. Friend makes his point very effectively. The Government are unable to convince the National Farmers Union, and farmers generally, of the accuracy of figures that they say are much less important than they obviously are.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) reflected on the many ironies of the situation. There certainly are a great number. Many double standards have been operated throughout this episode. Tory Euro-sceptics who have been keen, indeed gleeful, in their criticism of European Union countries have usually omitted to refer to countries outside the EU that have also banned our beef. The Government must recognise that, even if the ban is lifted, as we all hope, it will be, a massive information campaign will be needed to ensure that other countries, many of which have a traditionally friendly attitude to Britain, accept British beef in the future.

There is also the irony of the Government's appeal to the European Court of Justice, given the many criticisms of the Court that have emanated from Conservative Members, and the schizophrenic approach to it adopted by the White Paper. There is also the irony involving the voting system. The Foreign Secretary spoke of the importance of unanimity, but I heard a radio interview in which the Minister of Agriculture seemed to suggest that, thank goodness—in his view—the matter could be decided through qualified majority voting; otherwise, it would be impossible to make any progress in the direction that the Government wanted.

Then there is the irony referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston—the blocking of measures that we in Britain particularly wanted, and from which we stood to benefit greatly. I endorse what my right hon. Friend said about the unfairness of penalising countries by blocking decisions even when those countries were third countries, not party to the dispute. I think that blocking aid to Russia, or to third-world countries, comes firmly into that category.

The Government now have a massive bridge-building exercise to undertake, and a great deal of reassurance to give many people who have been greatly worried and put out by their strategy. They certainly have many bridges to build with British industry. Many firms and industries have been extremely worried for a long time by the Government's approach to the whole European Union question. That has been confirmed by quotations, given in the House, from representatives of the Confederation of British Industry.

I know from my conversations with representatives of industries belonging to, for example, the Chemical Industries Association, how concerned they are that continuing Government criticisms of the EU may jeopardise their position in the single market. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is on record as saying that he is very worried about the pronouncements of many of his hon. Friends and their possible effect on inward investment. If the hon. Member for South Derbyshire were here, I am sure that she would endorse his comment, given that, like me, she comes from an area that has benefited greatly from such investment.

We need to build bridges with our European Union partners, and we hope that that can achieved if the Government adopt a much more constructive attitude to the issues to be considered by the Council of Ministers over the next few months. Presumably that will give the Government an opportunity to reverse the blocking of important measures that we have seen over the past few weeks.

The Government have a duty to reassure some of the countries that are applying for EU membership, which have been worried about the implications of the Government's policy, believing that, if it went on too long, it might jeopardise their applications and their relationship with the EU. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) mentioned the application of Cyprus, and, as he knows, in previous debates, we have strongly supported his line.

I warmly welcome the many powerful expressions of concern in the debate about the far too frequent xenophobic rantings during this episode, especially in the tabloid press. My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and many others spoke powerfully about that. It is a credit to the British people that they have not been whipped up into a xenophobic frenzy. The warm welcome given to many visitors from EU and other countries during the Euro 96 tournament has been good to see.

One of the measures that the Government blocked was a declaration against racism and xenophobia. If there is a settlement in Florence, will the Minister of State assure me that the Government will join our European partners and support that declaration?

I mentioned that the Foreign Secretary seemed keen to rewrite immediate history, but the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) told us about the rewriting of the history of our previous relations with Europe and the European Community. The Foreign Secretary rightly made the distinction between a free trade area and a single market, but Europe is not just a single market. We did not join just a single market when the British people decided in the 1970s to stay in the EC.

I confess to being old enough to remember the arguments during the referendum campaign and the speeches by people such as Enoch Powell about the danger of the loss of sovereignty in the EC. In many ways, those arguments were like the ones advanced today against the EU, but they show that, in the 1970s, we were joining not just a free trade area, but a deeper body of co-operation, with different aspects, including an important social dimension, which the Government often seem to forget.

I was glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North mentioned the social chapter. In recent weeks, there have been some interesting developments on that. I was pleased that the principal employment adviser of the Confederation of British Industry recommended an end to the Government's opt-out from the social chapter. I remind the Minister of State—perhaps he will refer to this—that it is important to read what the social chapter says. Not many people seem to realise that it refers to "the need to maintain the competitiveness of the Community economy."

It also says that measures should be gradually implemented and that directives should avoid "administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings."

Why does the Prime Minister never mention that in all his rantings against the social chapter? Is it because, if he did so, his opt-out from the social chapter would clearly be seen as the shabby political manoeuvre it is?

If there is agreement on beef, the Florence summit will allow the discussion of many other matters, some of which have been referred to by my right hon. and hon. Friends. The all-important question of tackling unemployment is on the summit agenda. I hope that the Minister of State will assure us that the Government will back some of the employment initiatives proposed by the European Commission president and by many Governments in their interesting submissions to the summit.

I commend the submission of the Austrian Government, which describes that country's successful experience of a strong currency combined with an active employment policy. I should like the Minister to welcome the submissions of the Irish, Belgian, Netherlands, Luxembourg and Danish Governments—all of whom want complementary action on employment at European level to supplement national action.

The Government's attitude to employment in Europe is staggeringly complacent. From the world prosperity league, to which the Government do not like to refer, it is clear that the UK's record is not good and that it has much to do to catch up with the progress made by other European countries over the past 16 years in employment policies and creation. The current Conservative poster campaign—"Yes it hurt. Yes it worked"—goes down badly with my constituents. For some reason, the Conservatives chose to site that poster, referring to low unemployment, in a ward in my constituency that suffers from high unemployment. A similar poster, referring to the number of people who own their homes, is to be found in another part of my constituency where there is little home ownership. If the Conservatives carry on behaving like that, their campaign will not be terribly successful.

I appreciate that the Minister has been asked many questions, but if he has time, perhaps he will give some explanation for the Government's mysterious position on qualified majority voting and powers for the European Parliament. At times, the Government talk of no increase in QMV, at others about no significant increase. They do the same in relationship to the powers of the European Parliament.

In recent weeks, part of the hidden agenda of the Minister's friends has been revealed, with withdrawal at last mentioned by some of them. Despite the overall pro-European tone of this debate, the former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd)—who is not known for making extravagant statements—has been writing letters to The Economist warning that the UK will have to man the ramparts all over again. I wonder whether the Minister agrees.

[Ms Quin]

It will take the Government a long time to restore, if they ever do, Britain's standing in Europe—and the Government do not have that much time left. This country needs a Government who will approach the future challenges of enlargement, CAP reform and so on without being handicapped by the souring of relations that has frequently marked the present Government's record.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston concluded his speech by saying that the UK needs a fresh start. It can have that with a change of Government. That would mean a fresh start in Europe and a much needed fresh start in Britain. It would allow a far more constructive relationship between the UK and Europe which would give the British people a better deal from EU membership and help to create a sound basis for the enlarged and renewed European Union that we all want in future.

9.43 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Davis): I take the opportunity to reinforce the congratulations expressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). The right hon. Gentleman and I have crossed swords before, but his elevation to the Privy Council is well deserved.

This has been a fascinating and high-quality debate across the Floor of the House. It will be very hard to do justice to all the points raised, so I apologise in advance to hon. Members whose points I do not deal with in my comments.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made clear, the United Kingdom's membership of the European Union is vital to our national interests, to our position in the world, to our nation's economy and—to agree with only one part of the comments made by hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—to the peace of Europe, which is an important part of our national interest. That dominating strategic fact drives our policy in the longer term.

The immediate prospect that I must deal with today, as has been made apparent in the debate, is the crisis of the European handling of BSE. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy)—I think in a spirit of teasing—told the House about my good relations with my opposite numbers around Europe. I suspect that he was trying to undermine me in some way. Very seriously, however, those who know my origins will realise just how much distaste I have for the extremes of xenophobia about which one hears from time to time. I should like to make that clear.

One of the misfortunes of this exercise has been a growth in xenophobia. That started not with the non-co-operation policy, however, but with the frustration of the British people at the behaviour of the European Union during the course of this exercise. The Union's action in banning British beef exports was inappropriate, precipitate and damaging to the industry—not only in Britain, but across the continent. The non-co-operation policy arises from the repeated refusal of our partners to engage properly in negotiations. We faced the prospect of the ban continuing indefinitely, and it was not in our national interests to allow that to happen.

It is now more than 12 weeks since the start of the ban. In that time my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, made proposal after proposal to the institutions of the Union, and he demonstrated time and again that there was no basis for the ban. Other Ministers did the same—including myself on a number of occasions—in the political networks in which one must deal. Some of our partners merely refused our proposals. What was worse, some of them refused to offer alternatives or constructive criticism. It was often impossible to get a clear idea of a country's policy. We faced the prospect of endless inaction, while a British industry employing 650,000 people foundered. It would have been irresponsible to let that situation continue. That is not xenophobic or anti-European, but a matter of national interest that a Government must take seriously.

That is why, with regret, we adopted the policy of non-co-operation and blocked EC business. We did not do it lightly. We did it because the behaviour of some member states left us no alternative. We decided that progress would not be possible in the intergovernmental conference or elsewhere until, to quote my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister:

"we have agreement on lifting the ban on beef derivatives and a clear framework in place leading to lifting the wider ban."—[Official Report, 21 May 1996; Vol. 278, c. 100.]

Some, particularly in Europe, have asserted that that policy breaks the law. They have suggested that it breaks article 5. It does not. No article of the treaty dictates how nation states should vote. There are, however, articles that make it illegal to impose unilateral bans on importers in the single market, and there are articles that make it illegal to ignore the lifting of the derivatives ban. We are not the ones who have broken the law. Others have threatened to break the law by refusing to lift the ban on beef derivatives, and we shall look to the Commission and, if necessary, the European Court of Justice to see that the rules are applied. Throughout this crisis we have resolutely refused to be drawn down the path of illegality. Many have recommended that, but we have refused. In pursuing a framework for lifting the ban on British beef, we are simply asking the Commission to fulfil its proper duties under the treaties.

What we are doing is not unprecedented. Several of our partners have resorted to tough tactics in the past to secure national interests. Many observers have recalled the French empty-chair policy of 1965-66, one subordinate aim of which was to protect French farmers. In recent years, Spain, Italy and others have used blocking tactics in pursuit of national aims.

Several hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mrs. Currie), have expressed concern about long-term damage to our standing. I have not been aware, in any of the meetings of the European Union that I have attended, that any of the countries I have mentioned are suffering from their past actions being held against them, and I do not foresee that being a problem for us in the future.

The Prime Minister has made it clear that normal work in the European Union and progress at the IGC will not be possible until we have secured a framework for progressive removal of the ban on British beef exports. There is a growing realisation that the restoration of the beef market is a European interest, not just a British one. After all, German consumers may not be eating British beef, but one of the problems facing that country is that substantial numbers of them are not eating German beef either.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) often says things in the Chamber with which I agree, but I must correct him on one point. We do not put the action of individual countries down to malignancy in any way, and he should not misunderstand that. We should recognise that many of them have their own internal political problems of different sorts.

As the House knows, the Commission will be putting forward its proposal for Florence. Four weeks ago that was deemed to be impossible, even though we had asked for it a number of times. The framework has been and will be considered by member states. Four weeks ago, that was denied. So, even before Florence, our tactics have precipitated progress in negotiations. We could not have come so far without non-co-operation.

Throughout this, the Labour party has taken its traditional opportunistic line. The Labour leader was at first confused, and then he was tentatively supportive. All the time he was trying to seize some party advantage for a situation in which, in his own words, the "national interest is engaged". For example, our negotiations were not helped by the actions of Labour MEPs who criticised the Government in the European Parliament on a number of occasions. We were not helped by the Labour leader's attack on the Government's handling of the issue when he was in Germany the other day—the very country whose media have been most strident in their criticism of British beef.

I suppose that on this issue the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye could be considered a neutral observer. He characterised Labour's policy as running with the hare and hunting with the hounds. I could not have put that better myself.

The right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) talked about what represents a success in this. The criterion for success is whether it delivers solutions to the problems faced by the beef industry. The aim is the fastest possible delivery of confidence in British beef, the fastest possible delivery in access to a single market and the fastest possible resolution to the European crisis on beef.

I started with beef because, naturally, it was uppermost in our mind. However, our vigorous defence of the United Kingdom's interest in Europe is not restricted to the policy on beef. That defence will continue in our other discussions in Florence. In our discussions on employment—the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) raised that issue—the Government will impress on our European partners the need to create the right economic climate for job creation. We will stress the foolishness of increasing the burden of non-wage costs.

Our defence of British interests will continue in our discussions on subsidiarity and deregulation and on cutting the burden of present and future European legislation. It will continue in the IGC, where we will reject proposals to centralise power in Brussels—proposals fuelled solely by misguided ideology. At the IGC we will refuse any extension of the powers on qualified majority voting.

The hon. Members for Gateshead, East and for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) all raised the issue of employment. That is just about the most important issue that will be addressed in Florence. Employment is Europe's biggest problem and has been its biggest failure. Employment creation is one of the great weaknesses of the European Union.

Since 1960, the number of jobs in the United States has increased by nearly 200 per cent., while in Europe the number of jobs has increased by barely 10 per cent. In the past 20 years, the United States has created 36 million new jobs as against 5 million in the European Union. Every other trading bloc has done better than Europe in that respect.

Mr. Renton: I am listening carefully to my hon. Friend. He should recognise that one reason for higher employment growth in the United States has been its consistently lower interest rates than most European countries. As we move towards greater stability in the single market, possibly through economic and monetary union, we hope for lower interest rates, which will generate lower unemployment.

Mr. Davis: It is a little off my European brief, but as an ex-business man I can tell my right hon. Friend that the primary concern in interest rates is the nominal interest rate. The best method of dealing with that is low inflation, which happens to be a primary policy of this Government—Europe or not.

The UK, uniquely within the EU, has a good record on creating jobs—moreover, jobs in the private, not the public, sector. Since 1979, the UK has created as many jobs in the private sector as have been created in the whole of the rest of the EU. That is the answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who offered the thesis that, in order to compete with the far east, we had to offer the wages of the far east. We have demonstrated that that is not the case.

All that is no accident. It comes from an approach based on free trade and competition, reform of inflexible labour market regulations, reduction of non-wage costs, investment in skills and sound macro-economic policies—points all made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes in his excellent speech. That is why we opted out of the social chapter and why we continue to believe that our policies are the best for the British people.

That is also one reason why Britain is so successful at attracting overseas investment. Britain accounts for more than 30 per cent. of non-EU investment in the EU. Last year we attracted 22 per cent. of all German overseas investment—we are its number one destination. Despite what the hon. Member for Gateshead, East said, that should not be news to the Labour party. After all, two days ago its leader got the message direct from the president of the German equivalent of the Confederation of British Industry. Mr. Henkel drew attention to the British Government's record—our success in dealing with unemployment, in reducing state interference, in privatisation, in reducing the state share of national income and in the low taxation of profits. Mr. Henkel concluded:

"Great Britain has become the most attractive location for investment in Europe. Although the German market is twice as large as the British, since 1985 foreigners have invested 10 times as much in Britain as in Germany."

The Labour party never believes that fact when it hears it from us, so I hope that its leader will have been more receptive when he heard it from an impartial overseas observer—however galling it must be for the Leader of the Opposition to travel abroad only to have to listen to foreigners praising the British Conservative Government's approach.

In Florence, we will reinforce member states' efforts to create a sound, stable macro-economic framework in which business can create jobs. We agree with the emphasis on tackling unemployment in Mr. Santer's confidence pact and President Chirac's memorandum. But we will not agree to an increased role for trade unions, a single European social model or the abolition of the UK's social protocol opt-out. We will not agree to measures that destroy jobs rather than create them—to increased rigidity in the labour market, too much regulation, high non-wage labour costs and the sort of corporate approach which failed this country so badly under the last Labour Government.

I have very little time left, but I promised the right hon. Member for Livingston that I would answer his specific and important questions about Bosnia. First, he referred to the feasibility of free and fair elections. It is vital for the international community that elections are held on 14 September. It is the best hope for making a new start in Bosnia. We expect the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe chairman in office, Swiss Foreign Minister Cotti, shortly to certify that elections can go ahead. That will focus the efforts of all concerned on improving the conditions for free and fair elections.

In particular, we need improvements in freedom of movement, freedom of expression during the election campaign, as the hon. Gentleman said, and freedom of the media. It is not true that only Government candidates will have access to the media during the election campaign. The international community, in the form of the high representative, Carl Bildt, and the OSCE, which is responsible for supervising the elections, has secured an agreement on fair access to prime time television. We shall ensure that all parties stick to the agreement.

The return of refugees has begun: tens of thousands have returned since the end of the war, but it will be a long process. Hundreds of thousands will not have returned by the time of the elections, so we have ensured that there will be ways in which they can all vote. They will vote either where they are registered in the 1991 census, in which case they may vote in absentia, or where they plan to return to, in which case they may go there to vote.

The right hon. Member for Livingston raised the question of Karadzic and Mladic. Obviously, we agree that indicted war criminals must be brought to justice. It is not acceptable that they continue to be free and it is worse if they exercise power and influence—

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

TRIBUNALS OF INQUIRY (EVIDENCE) ACT 1921

Resolved,

That it is expedient that a Tribunal be established for inquiring into a definite matter of urgent public importance, that is to say, the abuse of children in care in the former County Council areas of Gwynedd and Clwyd.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

New Age Travellers (Tayside)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

10 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): I thank Madam Speaker for giving me the opportunity to raise the subject of so-called new age travellers on the Adjournment debate tonight. I say so-called because, in a letter to me—one of many—the writer says:

"There are, of course, no such things as New Age Travellers".

It is a term the press invented. The letter says:

"These people are vagrants.

They have not opted out of society as may be claimed, but choose to 'cherry-pick' the rules in order to select the best ones and observing no duties and responsibilities, nor do they have any respect for anyone but themselves.

They roam in gangs and make nothing but trouble and expense to the mainly law abiding citizens everywhere."

Be that as it may, the so-called new age travellers had a sizeable encampment in my constituency during April and May. They gathered ostensibly to celebrate a Pictish festival at Dunnichen hill near the village of Letham. The event has taken place for several years. In earlier years, Robbie the Pict and his followers had attended for a weekend. The local people enjoyed much of what took place then.

Sadly, this year, the event was an unlicensed rock music festival of around two weeks' duration. At the height of the event, about 2,500 people were involved. By the second weekend, the number had dropped to about 300 travellers, most of whom appeared to be of English origin—odd people, I suggest, to be celebrating a Pictish festival.

The major problem experienced during the event was excessive noise caused by amplified rock music played almost incessantly over several days. It was clearly audible in the village of Letham some two miles away. Not surprisingly, law-abiding, tax-paying constituents complained to me and to Tayside police.

In addition, dogs accompanying the travellers were allowed to run wild, and they caused considerable distress, injury and death to sheep. Some 2,000 pheasant chicks were destroyed. A number of sheep were killed, and several of the travellers' dogs were shot by estate staff.

There were also problems of rubbish and litter, there was damage to walls and fences, and obstruction was caused by the travellers' vehicles, many of which were without road fund licences, MOTs or insurance. There were no sanitary or toilet facilities. About 2,500 people were on the site, and raw sewage drained into the main water supply for the estate's home farm and cottages, and thereafter into Rescobie loch and on to Forfar.

The anti-social and at times abusive stance adopted by the travellers made difficulties for the local farmers and estate staff. It also made police negotiations virtually impossible, and led to a confrontational approach which, was unhelpful in fostering good relations. All that occurred despite a high degree of tolerance exercised by local residents and the Tayside police. It was also apparent that the unlicensed sale of alcohol was taking place on the site, and there were stories about soft drugs being used, Tayside police confirm that the officers on duty were of the opinion that many of the travellers were obviously under the influence of alcohol or drugs for much of the period.

Following continued complaints, a police operation was undertaken to disable and seize the most prominent sound system being operated on the site. While that was being carried out, the officers came under sustained attack from the travellers, who threw stones and brandished sticks and other implements. Fortunately, no injuries of any consequence were caused, but it is worrying that the travellers had prepared a cache of weaponry in readiness for the police action.

Seizure of the sound equipment and the charging of the operator were dealt with as a common law breach of the peace. In addition, 16 individuals were charged under section 61 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 in respect of the camp at Dunnichen hill and a prior encampment near Forfar.

My concern is for future years. We do not want Dunnichen hill to become the Stonehenge of Scotland. Robbie the Pict and his friends will return next year. We do not want the new age travellers joining them and a repeat of what happened this year.

I am reminded that the Opposition opposed the aggravated trespass clause in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act being applied to Scotland, yet the police used their powers under that Act in this case and in an earlier case involving the removal of hawkers, when a direction to leave land was made under section 61 and the hawkers agreed to move without further objection.

The police would not have been able to operate without those powers, yet they were opposed by the Opposition. I remind the House of that because, as is so often the case with law and order legislation, the Opposition oppose the introduction of powers and then are delighted when they are used in the interests of law-abiding citizens.

I accept that decisions about the appropriate course of action to take with new age travellers must be made by the chief constable, but I submit that chief constables should be directed to use section 61 as early as possible.

I also agree that affected landowners should request the removal of new age travellers. In the case of Dunnichen, only one of the two landowners made such a request. That hampered police operations, as it placed the police in a difficult position and required an operational judgment based on the level of the nuisance and the disruption. I wish to place on record my thanks for the way in which the police acted, and the fact that they managed to take the necessary action.

I recognise that, in legal terms, the powers under section 61 are adequate, but they can be hampered by practical difficulties. If the travellers refuse to leave, the only option left to the police is to arrest the offenders. Such action will probably lead to confrontation and may leave family groups stranded while the head of the household is detained.

Another problem may arise from a failure to define the extent of land to which a section 61 direction is intended to apply, and on which further trespass is forbidden. Will my right hon. Friend consider issuing guidelines to clarify the position and to assist the police? I understand that, for the police, dealing with new age travellers essentially involves enforcing the law and is a matter of practicality. The number involved and their reluctance to accept regulation of their life-style can make police intervention a matter of considerable difficulty. That is why the Conservative party was determined to put those powers on the statute book.

Consequently, the practice differs considerably from the theory and from the Act. Sections 61 and 62, which give certain powers to the police, may, if exercised, risk causing further problems. I recognise that, but even so I believe that, without those powers, the police could not have acted as they did so effectively at Dunnichen.

Even if we do not use the powers, we cannot accept lawlessness. I make it perfectly clear that my constituents will not accept lawlessness.

We also need a definition of the extent of the land to which a section 61 direction is intended to apply, on which further trespass is forbidden. That is important, because we are trying to deal with a possible repeat next year. If a section 61 direction is intended to apply, will it apply to the whole estate? In Scotland, if we do apply it not to the entire estate, but to the precise site that the travellers occupied this year, they could simply move a couple of fields away, and we would have a problem.

Finally, we must address the ghastly fact that the travellers are to a considerable extent supported in their life style by the social security regime, which pays out benefits irrespective of their place of residence. As those individuals are reluctant to contribute to society or to seek employment, why should the taxpayer subsidise their way of life? Why should the taxpayers in Letham have those people forced upon them? Why should taxpayers have to see that, if those people go to an office to pick up their money and find that it is not there, the police have another incident on their hands?

Faced with such intrusions into their lives, why should my constituents not say to my right hon. Friend, "Thank you for putting those necessary powers on to the statute book, but can you use your persuasive powers to get the Department for Social Security to reconsider how it makes payments to travellers, and perhaps to cease that form of mobile support?"

I, too, say to my right hon. Friend, "Thank you for the powers that you have given the police and the fact that we can move the travellers on." I trust that sections 61 and 62 will mean that they cannot come back, and that we can do what was done at Stonehenge. In plain language, I conclude by saying that we do not want them back. We are happy to have Robbie the Pict, but we do not want the new age travellers.

I have told the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) whose constituency abuts mine and was affected by the same new age travellers—they went into his constituency and caused considerable trouble—that he can have a couple of minutes to speak before the winding-up speech.

10.12 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) has illustrated graphically the problems visited upon Angus by the new age travellers, and I thank him for allowing me to speak briefly in his Adjournment debate, which I much appreciate.

Angus is used to dealing with genuine travelling people, and has installed some excellent travelling people's sites. The village of Letham, which is one of Scotland's major beauty spots, is used to Robbie the Pict and the small number of Pictish-related annual events which have taken place over many years with little or no disturbance—indeed, with some enjoyment for local people.

[Mr. Andrew Welsh]

If travelling people leave the area as they find it and arrive in small numbers, there is minimal disturbance, but what happened recently meant that some of the most picturesque and vulnerable areas were swamped with new age travellers, who caused damage to property and livestock, health and sanitation problems, and left a trail of angry people in their wake.

New age travellers driven from England should not look upon Scotland as a soft touch. Those scenes must not be repeated. Action must be taken to prevent a recurrence of such large-scale gatherings and the disturbance that they create for the surrounding communities. That can be done through exclusion orders and all the other available mechanisms.

I support Angus council's tough approach to the problems, and its initiative in calling for a summit meeting to review the situation, which will allow all the authorities involved—Angus council, the police and the Members of Parliament—as well as the individuals directly involved and Letham community council, to meet and plan ahead to ensure that there is a co-ordinated community response to any future recurrence in the Angus area.

I am sure that Angus council will echo the words of the hon. Member for North Tayside—this will happen again. We will have to be ready for it and take all possible steps to protect the local environment and the local community. What happened was unacceptable and we must ensure that we are fully prepared and able to act instantly on behalf of local residents and the wider community in Angus.

I congratulate the hon. Member for North Tayside on choosing this topic for the Adjournment debate. I hope that the problem will be dealt with effectively and efficiently, and that it will not recur.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) on securing a debate on this important topic, and I welcome the contribution from the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh). I note that he and his colleague, the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), are the only Opposition Members present for the debate—not a single Labour or Liberal Democrat Member is present.

The fact that we are having this debate tonight is a vindication of the Government's policy of ensuring that the provisions relating to collective trespass applied to Scotland as well as to the rest of the United Kingdom. I must gently point out to the hon. Member for Angus, East that he and his party opposed that vehemently, along with Labour and the Liberal Democrats, when the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 made its way through this House.

At the time, those provisions were spoken against and voted against by Labour. For the Liberals, the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) denied that the problems that the Act was designed to address existed in Scotland. Yet we had the pleasure in the Scottish Grand Committee on Monday of the former leader of the Liberals, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), calling for action under the Act against new age travellers as a result of local complaints. It is not only within the Labour party that we see leaders finding that they must embrace Conservative policies that they had opposed.

Because we have taken action, even in the face of strong opposition from the Scottish National party and others, the police were able to act decisively in response to such calls. I shall try to deal with the various points that my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside raised, but it may be helpful if I say something about the background to the situation involving new age travellers in North Tayside.

My information is that, on 26 March 1996, a number of travelling people, including family groups, camped on Lour estate, near Forfar. The landowners requested them to leave the site. When they failed to do so, the group was required to quit by the police. Again there was a failure to comply, and seven people were reported to the procurator fiscal at Forfar for contravention of the trespass provisions in section 61 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

The group moved off the Lour estate and joined other new age travellers from various parts of the United Kingdom—including, as my hon. Friend said, Northumberland, Cornwall and Lincolnshire—who were camped on Dunnichen hill at Letham near Forfar. The purpose of the gathering was apparently to celebrate the battle of Nechtansmere between the Picts and Northumbrians, which is reputed to have taken place on that site. An unofficial festival was planned for the weekend of 17 to 19 May. Police estimate that, by that weekend, some 300 to 400 new age travellers had camped at the site, with about a further 1,500 people who intended to stay for the weekend.

That annual festival has taken place for more than 11 years and generally passed without serious incident. Local opinion towards the festival over the years has been ambivalent, with many people—particularly shopkeepers—welcoming the activity and the added trade arising from the presence of occasional travellers and weekend visitors. However, it has become clear that, whatever the historical origins of the festival, it now represents a significant incursion on land, and a considerable public order and safety problem.

This year's event was scheduled to take place on the weekend of 17 to 19 May. Following complaints from one of the landowners, a large-scale police operation was mounted to restrict car access to the area. That was successful, and there is little doubt that the torrential rain that fell in the area that weekend and the absence of vehicles, which would have otherwise provided sleeping accommodation and shelter for many of those attending, contributed to the failure of the event.

A number of those gathered for the festival decided to extend their stay, in the knowledge that the following weekend was a bank holiday. During the intervening period, a group of individuals thought not to be directly associated with the new age travellers brought a sound system from Cornwall, including an 8,000 watt amplifier. Throughout the night of Friday 24 May, the police received numerous complaints from the residents of Letham, as my hon. Friend said, some two miles distant, about the levels of noise coming from the campsite. On the morning of Saturday 25 May, police officers attended the site and took possession of the amplifier in the face of a great deal of hostility. Stones, bricks and bottles were hurled at the police. They have video evidence of the operation, which confirms that.

Over the second weekend, police mounted road blocks at three points to prevent further arrivals at the site. People leaving the site by vehicle were informed that they would not be permitted to return. Over the period of the police operations, 16 people were reported to the procurator fiscal under the illegal trespass provisions of section 61 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. A further 10 were charged with other offences, including police assault and breach of the peace.

At the end of the festival, police allowed one vehicle loaded with petrol cans to leave the site to collect fuel for some of the others. That has been the subject of inaccurate reporting by some sections of the media. I make it perfectly clear, therefore, that the police neither paid for nor provided petrol, as part of some kind of deal to persuade the new age travellers to leave. Nothing could be further from the truth. Tayside police have understandably taken great exception to those allegations, and the local commander has written in the strongest terms to the editor of the newspaper in question, who I hope will apologise.

For the record, a little more than 1 gallon of diesel was supplied by the police to two vehicles that had run out of fuel some distance from the area while travelling towards Perth, to enable them to get to the nearest garage. I would expect the police to extend such assistance to any stranded motorist.

On Tuesday 28 May, the new age travellers began moving off Dunnichen hill. The group subsequently travelled in two directions. One group travelled into the Grampian area, where it later stopped at Gourdon near Inverbervie—to the considerable annoyance of my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside. The other group, I am led to believe, ultimately settled near Peebles.

The Gourdon group initially settled peacefully, with the police keeping a watchful eye on it. However—I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's remarks are passed on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security—after they had cashed their DSS benefit cheques, a number of the travellers became, to put it politely, the worse for wear with drink. Two individuals left the site in a vehicle. The police assessed the manner in which the vehicle was being driven as a danger not only to those in the vehicle but to the general public. The vehicle was stopped and one individual was apprehended and, I understand, charged with road traffic offences.

The other occupant of the vehicle returned to the site and alerted associates there. That led to a confrontation with the police, and a number of arrests were made. Police subsequently directed the travellers to quit the site and informed them that if they failed to do so, the trespass provisions of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 would be enforced.

I understand that the Gourdon group, consisting of approximately 100 people and 35 vehicles, left the site on Sunday 16 June. Latest reports from the Northern constabulary suggest that they are at present in the Spean bridge area.

The other group, consisting of about 50 people, including women and children, arrived at a site near Peebles on I June. They are camped on private property, and the landowner has written to the chief constable seeking their removal under the 1994 Act. I understand from Lothian and Borders police that the new age travellers do not intend to remain there much longer. They have indicated to police—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will no doubt note this—that, once they have collected their DSS benefit cheques and repaired their vehicles, they will move on. I believe that that has been accepted by the police and the landowner.

The police have established links with the travellers and have told them that, if they do not move by an agreed date, they fully intend to use the powers available to them under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 to eject them. That date will be notified to the travellers in advance, and the police fully expect that they will leave before the deadline. If they do not, they will be effectively moved on. The police believe that relationships with the travellers are such that the use of force will not be required. I am told that the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale has been kept fully informed by the police.

The examples that I have just cited demonstrate that there is a growing problem with mass trespass in Scotland. The Government decided that having the power to deal with trespassers in Scotland was sensible and prudent, as we rightly anticipated that anti-social development. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office said in the debate on the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994:

"Scotland is not immune to this kind of activity . . . there is every reason to take preventive action".—[Official Report, 13 April 1994; Vol. 241, c. 378.]

The Government therefore gave the police new powers to deal with trespassers under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. Those powers came into force in November 1994, and they fall into three broad categories.

First, provisions relating to the offence of aggravated trespass provide protection for those engaging in lawful activities, whoever and whatever they may be, from trespassers who intend to behave disruptively. The Act gives the police power to direct trespassers to leave the land if they reasonably believe that the trespassers will seek to disrupt or prevent a lawful activity on that land.

The second group of provisions in the Act is aimed at preventing mass encampment on private land by trespassers. Those powers are triggered only if people invade land with the intention of residing there, refuse to leave that land and then damage it, or destroy property, crops or buildings, or threaten the occupier, a member of his family or agent.

Thirdly, the police can direct persons assembling on land to leave the land when it is believed that a gathering will take place such as to cause serious distress to the inhabitants of the locality by the playing of amplified music during the night.

The events that I have described demonstrate that the police are prepared to use those powers, and that they work. The use of the powers in the 1994 Act is, of course, essentially an operational matter for the police, but I have every confidence that the police will take all necessary steps to respond effectively to any complaints received. I understand that the police believe that the powers that they now have are adequate to enable them to deal effectively with such situations.

I believe that the police in Tayside, as well as Grampian and Lothian and Borders, have acted firmly and responsibly in dealing with the incidents that I have described. By using the powers in the 1994 Act, they have been successful in limiting the damage that has been caused to property. Indeed, I understand that one landowner has complimented the police in Tayside on their handling of the situation at Dunnichen hill.

I deplore the behaviour of some of the new age travellers. They are taking advantage of the good will of society in a way that I abhor. They are souring public opinion against the traditional traveller whom the Government have done much to help. But I welcome the firm police action that has been taken, and I have every confidence that that will continue in the future.

The situation is yet another example of a strong law and order policy initially being vilified by the Opposition parties, yet a short time later they are only too willing to urge use of such powers, especially when pressed by their local electorate into doing so. That is what makes us different from Opposition Members. The Government believe in protecting local communities from the damage and nuisance caused by new age travellers and their like. The Opposition's focus is on protecting the imagined rights of a tiny minority, to impinge on communities in a way that Opposition Members would find unacceptable on their own doorstep.

I welcome the opportunity to repeat my pledge that the Government will wage relentless war on all law breakers in every area of life, and will sustain the rights and security of our citizens on every occasion. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside will take every opportunity to convey it to his constituents that, had he not been in the House, supporting the Government, those powers would not have been in place so that action could be taken effectively to protect the interests of his constituents with his support, as has happened in recent weeks.

Drugs Strategy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Newton.]

9.34 am

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I welcome this opportunity to open a full day's debate on the Government's strategy against drugs. It is almost exactly a year ago—on 9 June 1995—when hon. Members last had a chance to assess progress in tackling drug misuse. That debate provided a considerable number of thoughtful and informative contributions and I look forward to a similarly constructive discussion on this occasion.

No one present this morning and no one who is a parent or who has concerns about the dangers facing our young people can fail to reflect on the serious problems of drug misuse—and not just in this country, although they are certainly serious enough here.

I can give some facts by way of illustration. The total street value of seizures of illegal drugs in 1995 was £457 million, 5 per cent. up on the previous year; the number of drug offenders was 87,000, 25 per cent. up; the number of notified addicts was 34,000, 21 per cent. up; and, the number of newly notified addicts was 13,500, an increase of 17 per cent. One study found that 664 drug misusers, before treatment, committed more than 70,000 crimes over a three-month period. The just published 1994 "British Crime Survey" showed that more than four in 10 of 16 to 29-year-olds said that they had taken an illegal drug, although—an important balancing factor—only 14 per cent. had taken one in the previous month.

Surveys regularly show that drugs and drug-related violent crime are high among public concerns at all levels of society and that our young people—in rural areas just as much as in towns and cities—feel consistently pressurised by what is sometimes described as the drug culture. Even though those figures are disturbing, it is important not to respond to them with despair or with a sense that nothing can be done. It remains the case that drug misuse among young people is not, and I stress that word, a routine "rite of passage"—the phrase sometimes used. Less than a quarter of our young people have taken a prohibited drug in the past year and it is still the case that more than half of our youngsters never take an illegal drug.

Cannabis is easily the most dominant drug of misuse, with just 6 per cent. of our young people ever having taken Ecstasy, 3 per cent. cocaine, 1 per cent. heroin and less than 1 per cent. crack. In acknowledging the problem, we must be careful not to exaggerate it and be unnecessarily defeatist. Nevertheless, we face a major challenge in tackling a problem that causes harm, destruction to families and communities and ultimately, and of course most tragically, deaths; there were nearly 2,500 drug-related deaths in England and Wales in 1994.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I apologise for interrupting the right hon. Gentleman at such an early stage, but I am confused by what he is saying. He has used the expression "illegal drugs" about four times and "drugs" eight times. A particular drug is involved in 40 per cent. of all crimes of violence and of abuse—a drug called alcohol. It is important to differentiate between illegal drugs and drugs, but many of us want to talk about the drugs of massive abuse, which are tobacco, alcohol and some medicinal drugs. The Leader of the House should make it clear to which drugs he is referring.

Mr. Newton: I think that I have made it pretty clear that I am talking about drugs in the sense in which the word is conventionally used—I have just listed a number of them—but that is not to dismiss concerns about alcohol problems, for example. I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, he will want to develop further the point that he just implied. The Government have a range of policies designed to address alcohol misuse. Several drug action teams, to which I shall refer later, embrace programmes against alcohol abuse alongside their programmes against drug abuse in the sense in which I am using the term. I do not dismiss concerns about alcohol, but my speech today is focused on drugs in the sense of the chemical substances that I mentioned.

The Government have been pursuing a vigorous response to the problems that I have outlined. I am speaking today because I have the task of chairing the Cabinet Sub-Committee on Drug Misuse and, through it, of overseeing the development of strategies for tackling drugs across the United Kingdom. With the active support of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who is responsible for Customs and Excise, I have been particularly concerned with developing a strategy for England; "Tackling Drugs Together", which I presented to the House, in the form of a White Paper, in May 1995.

At the core of the strategy is tough law enforcement, accessible treatment and effective education and prevention. All three are important. We aim to make communities safe from drug-related crime; to cut the acceptability and availability of drugs to young people; and to reduce the health risks of drug misuse. Significant resources are available year on year to do that—more than £500 million—and additional resources are being provided as and when necessary, such as an extra £34 million for 1996-97 for new education training projects, publicity, drug treatment services, and treatment and control programmes in the Prison Service.

The strategy's progress is dependent on partnerships at national level and on partnerships between local agencies and their wider communities, especially with the new drug action teams that have been established across England.

[Mr. Newton]

I want therefore to report primarily on the achievements of the first year of the strategy and to look forward to some of the tasks ahead.

First, I should refer to the significant developments in other parts of the UK. Under the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Scotland Against Drugs campaign was set firmly under way last month. It was set up with all-party support, which I hope all such campaigns enjoy and will continue to enjoy, and is making a substantial impact on public confidence and support north of the border.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales last month established a new drug and alcohol strategy for Wales, with a new unit managing it.

Mr. Flynn: I am sorry to interrupt—I promise that this will be the last time—but the right hon. Gentleman mentioned Wales. In its campaign against drugs, why did the Welsh Office decide a month ago to cut the funding of Alcohol Action Wales, a body that has done tremendous work in co-ordinating the hundreds of people who are working to reduce the problems caused by alcohol abuse? Are not the Government concentrating on illegal drugs and neglecting the harm done by drugs that are legal?

Mr. Newton: That is a rerun of the hon. Gentleman's first intervention. The fact is that the Government take all those problems seriously, but there are different strands, and there are different approaches to tackling problems in different parts of the United Kingdom, as is considered appropriate to the circumstances in each case.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), is spearheading a partnership strategy in Northern Ireland. In each case, the strategies are being pursued with every effort to secure all-party support. I pay tribute to the approach that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) has consistently adopted. Our approach is eliciting widespread support across the community.

Such breadth of support is vital to our efforts everywhere, not least in England. That is reflected by the fact that the Prime Minister himself led the event to mark the first anniversary of the drug strategy last month at the Royal National theatre. Many hon. Members have contributed to that support, not least my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), who continues to do such an excellent job as chairman of the all-party group on drug misuse. He has not been able to attend the start of the debate, but I know that he hopes to join us later and I hope that he will be able to contribute.

The strategy is increasingly mobilising a wide range of agencies and individuals who have demonstrated their commitment to the partnership against drugs. I especially acknowledge the expert advice that the Government receive from the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs, which only last week produced another excellent report, this time on drug misusers and the prison system, with the self-explanatory title of an "Integrated Approach". The report, which the Government have welcomed, sets out in clear detail how the Prison Service should consider taking forward its responsibilities.

It is only right to acknowledge the tremendous strides that the Prison Service has made over the past year in establishing 22 highly innovative treatment programmes, in implementing mandatory drug testing without any significant difficulties, and in demonstrating to prisoners, their families and the wider public that it is serious about tackling drug misuse. I saw that strikingly confirmed at Wayland prison in Norfolk earlier this year. An imaginative and, I hope, effective treatment programme had been put in place.

I also pay tribute to the many excellent voluntary sector agencies which continue, in a sometimes difficult climate, to deliver quality services at a fair price. I especially commend their involvement at local level in working with those directly at risk of drug misuse.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid–Staffordshire): Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge the valuable help that has been given by the national lottery? Is he aware that Resolve, a national solvent abuse charity based in my constituency, has received a lottery grant of more than £70,000, which will be put to good use?

Mr. Newton: I am glad both to acknowledge my hon. Friend's point about the contribution that national lottery funds are making, not only in this aspect of our national life but in many others, and to note the importance of the solvent abuse problem and the need to tackle it. Many drug action teams have that very much on their agenda.

The private sector has also already demonstrated its potential for working with other agencies on drugs. Iceland plc, for example, inspired a recent Power Rangers competition for young people against drugs; Royal Insurance has sponsored a highly effective theatre group, which made a real impact on some primary school children whom I saw last October at a school in Notting Hill; and earlier this year, British Telecom produced "Sorted", a powerful and influential anti-drugs video that some hon. Members may have seen.

The video was a response to the tragic death of Leah Betts, following her 18th birthday party last November. It is fair to say that that death, which occurred at a hospital in my constituency, has done more than any other single incident to highlight the dangers of that hopelessly inappropriately named drug, Ecstasy. I especially acknowledge, as other hon. Members will want to, the tremendously courageous efforts of Leah's parents, Paul and Janet Betts, in mobilising public awareness about the dangers of Ecstasy and other drugs, and in highlighting the importance of reducing the supply of and demand for such drugs.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): In view of the tragic deaths of Leah Betts and many other young people, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is dangerous to encourage the call for the decriminalisation of drugs because it only exacerbates the problem? Drugs are evil and should stay outside the law. Will he make his position on that clear?

Mr. Newton: I shall indeed. The shortest answer that I can give is that I very much agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Flynn: I have spoken to the person who carried out the post-mortems on seven people who have died from Ecstasy, and I believe that the Leader of the House has given an extremely misleading account of the cause of death of that tragic young woman and others. I shall refer to that later in the debate, but we should give accurate advice to young people so that further deaths are avoided. The two key factors are overheating and excess water consumption.

Mr. Newton: I am tempted to suggest that it might be more helpful if the hon. Gentleman kept those points for the speech that he will no doubt seek to make later rather than continuing to intervene on mine—not that I mind responding, but it makes it more difficult to develop a series of connected remarks. As it happens, I gave no account of the cause of Leah Betts' death; I merely referred to the unhappy fact that it was undoubtedly related to taking the drug Ecstasy.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The right hon. Gentleman referred to the private sector. Does he agree that one of the most effective private sector contributions of the past year has been the play and film "Trainspotting"? I do not know whether he has seen it, but I believe that there has been no more graphic, dramatic and effective presentation of the disruption, social unease and devastating effects of drugs than that film. If we could get the message across as clearly as that film does, we would have a far less difficult job in drugs education.

Mr. Newton: I have not had the opportunity to see that film. I note the hon. Gentleman's commendation; I have certainly read a great deal about it.

In response to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) and others, it is important to recognise that young people can offer a powerful antidote to the complacent assumption that drugs are an inevitable part of growing up. Prompted by an invitation, which I readily accepted, from the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), given on the Floor of the House at the time of the White Paper's publication, I visited an excellent youth awareness programme project in Newham. I have also visited a further project at Merton. At the anniversary event led by the Prime Minister, one of YAP's workers, a 17-year-old young man called Danny, presented a compelling case for young people to get credible information about the realities and dangers of drugs. That is the exact point made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) will be interested to note that when I went to Merton, I was struck by the strong reaction from young people to a recent "Panorama" programme, which they believed had sent out confused and contradictory messages about the dangers of illegal drugs.

When I have talked to young people, many of whom have unhappily misused drugs, but who are now helping to prevent other young people from doing so, I have met strikingly few who advocate the legalisation or decriminalisation of the drugs that they have experienced. I am happy to make it clear, once again, to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam that we have no intention of legalising or decriminalising any currently illegal drugs.

There is simply no evidence that legalising any drugs, including cannabis, will do anything other than increase their use and the health risks and real harm that such drugs cause our young people. We should pay heed to the remarks of the mayor of Hulst in Holland, who has stated categorically and publicly what damage that country's liberalisation policy has caused in the past 20 years. Those problems are causing concern to a number of Holland's neighbours, as the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), made clear in a speech this week.

In the year since we launched "Tackling Drugs Together", we have seen some real progress. In an answer to a parliamentary question from my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes on 13 May, I outlined in considerable detail the achievement of all 49 White Paper tasks that were set for the first year. I do not propose to weary the House by rehearsing the full catalogue of those actions and steps forward, but I want to highlight some of the key developments.

First, in relation to supply reduction, enhanced efforts have been made on the international scene to tighten up the routes for drug trafficking. Only last month, the United Nations drugs control programme, with strong British support, made significant progress on action against Caribbean drug exports. Closer to home, co-operation between the police and Customs and Excise—which is improving all the time—assisted by the work of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, continues to develop, with joint operations and ever closer work together against joint targets and performance indicators. Police efforts to target major drug dealers within our country are complemented by Customs and Excise success in working against major drug trafficking organisations overseas. For example, customs dismantled or significantly disrupted nearly 100 international smuggling organisations during 1995.

Earlier this week, the Association of Chief Police Officers led a national drugs conference that was attended by a wider range of other agencies committed to tackling drugs than ever before. We heard of further innovative schemes and ideas to enhance efforts to reduce the supply of drugs. One excellent example, of which the hon. Member for Knowsley, North is no doubt aware, is that of Merseyside police—clearly at the front line of drug-related crime—which is working closely with the local authority to target drug dealing at nightclubs.

Similar good progress has been made towards reducing the health risks of drug misuse. The free national drugs helpline answered nearly 200,000 calls in the first year of its operation and is improving its service still further. The effectiveness review, undertaken under the auspices of the Department of Health, and on which the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), will comment later, reported on 1 May with the most comprehensive analysis ever of the effectiveness of drug treatment services in this country, and offered practical and effective steps for improving them still further. That task force, under the Rev. Dr. John Polkinghorne's leadership, gained widespread credit for its rigorous and realistic approach. Forty drugs projects were funded centrally last year to develop a range of early intervention services for a wide variety of vulnerable young people.

[Mr. Newton]

To avoid any misunderstanding, I should like to emphasise that enforcement, sometimes known as interdiction, and improved services are important ingredients that go together with something no less important, the need to reduce demand for drugs. Our hopes for a most effective reduction in drug misuse in the longer term clearly lie in that objective. We have also made good progress in that respect. Schools are now taking forward national guidance sent to them last year by the Department for Education and Employment, through better, more consistent drugs education for our young people. They are responding positively to the emphasis in the guidance on developing policies for drug education, and on dealing sensitively but effectively with drug-related incidents.

A national drugs campaign aimed at young people and their parents was launched by the Health Education Authority in February. An important part of that is the provision of clear, straightforward information of the kind set out in the "Parents' Guide to Drugs", which was recently launched. That document was subject to some rather unfair and selective media quotation that gave a distorted impression of its contents, but it provides parents with an important basis of factual information. They need that to help their children resist illegal drugs.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I share the right hon. Gentleman's opinion and commend him for his attempt to get the message across correctly. We must ensure that the media do not distort such a report by dramatising the slightly conciliatory points of view that it might put forward. The more collaboration we can achieve with the media, so that they act responsibly, the more effectively the message will get across to those who need to hear it.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his approach, and I agree with what he says.

In that context, it is especially striking to note the extent to which the police, without in any way neglecting their enforcement tasks, have increasingly viewed their role in education and demand reduction as important. Two of our major forces, the Metropolitan police in London and the Greater Manchester police—with one of whose senior people I spoke about this a few weeks ago—have recently launched strategies geared at helping young people to resist drugs.

Mr. Fabricant: I am curious on one point. Perhaps my right hon. Friend can clarify it for me. Certain ethnic communities in London and elsewhere feel that taking some drugs, particularly marijuana, is part of their tradition. I am a great believer in the saying, "When in Rome, do as the Romans do." Those communities obviously do not think that. Perhaps he can explain the Government and police views on the issue.

Mr. Newton: I am not in a position to give a police view of a particular problem—certainly not off the cuff at the Dispatch Box—but the Government position is that we seek to tackle the misuse of drugs in every part of our society and that our approach is the right one, across the spectrum.

Prevention and education projects throughout the country embrace partnership in an effective and practical way. For example, the Home Office drug prevention initiative has established a parents for prevention project in Birmingham, and in Northumbria a partnership with Proctor and Gamble—again, private sector involvement—has ensured that all 13-year-olds in the region receive consistent messages about drugs at school. Those are examples of practical projects on which we can build.

We are seeking to do that at local level, where action really matters, by establishing drug action teams throughout England—probably the biggest development in the past 12 months. The purpose of those 105 teams is to assess the nature and scale of local drug problems, to identify and implement action in line with the objectives of the overall strategy, and to keep their policies and operations on a coherent and effective footing.

I am hugely encouraged by the teams' progress to date, particularly bearing it in mind that they were established only last September. Since then, every team has submitted to me a comprehensive and detailed action plan setting out their objectives for the next two years, and I have formally agreed them, on the basis of monitoring progress through my central drugs co-ordination unit officials, to whom I pay particular tribute. That small unit has got through an amazing amount of work in a relatively short time. Every team is embarking on significant action to make a real difference in their local communities, in close consultation with groups and individuals who understand the practical problems on the ground.

During last year's debate, there was some concern about whether there would be sufficiently senior representation on the teams from health and local authorities, police, prison and probation services. I have been impressed by those senior people's commitment to work as closely as possible with their local communities, including the voluntary sector and district councils. There has been a particularly good contribution by local authority people leading the teams, including—and in the all-party spirit of this, I am happy to pay tribute to him—Labour councillor Derek Boden, who heads the Bury team. Like many other team leaders, he is showing considerable commitment and determination to achieve results.

Those results are already being seen in areas such as targeting drugs hot spots, increasing security for prison visits, bursaries for pupils to develop peer education packages, information and advice to young people in pubs and nightclubs, training and support for parents and teachers, shared care arrangements with general practitioners, and local council schemes for collecting discarded needles. Those and other activities are set out in a digest of good practice and ideas for drug action teams, a practically oriented document that we published in April.

Last month, I wrote to all Members of Parliament in England to highlight drug action teams' work, informing every Member of how to contact his or her local team. As a result, many colleagues on both sides of the House have made contact with their local teams. I hope that more contacts will take place and that those that have started will be sustained and developed.

It is still early days for drug action teams and I recognise that not all teams have been able to make as much progress as some. I have been impressed by the commitment to practical action, clearly demonstrated, for example, by the Essex team, led by the chief constable, by the leaders of the eight Greater Manchester drug action teams, whom I met a few weeks ago, and, more recently, by the team that I met in the London borough of Merton. Some teams have found it more difficult to pull together in the limited time, but I am convinced that there is collective determination throughout the country and that the teams can—and in many cases are already beginning to—bring about action that can make a difference.

The momentum needs to be sustained across all aspects of our strategy. Centrally, the Government will seek to play their part in that. Last month, the Prime Minister announced the creation of the post of an international drugs co-ordinator. I am pleased to inform the House that the co-ordinator will be taking up his post next month and will work closely with our principal international partners and with the UK Departments and agencies concerned. One of the key tasks will be to stimulate and to co-ordinate UK action in relation to producer and transit countries, and to ensure that UK international drugs initiatives are followed up and implemented vigorously.

Targeting dealers remains a priority and that is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has announced, as part of the Government's strategy on crime for England and Wales, plans to make sentences for drug dealers' third offences a mandatory minimum of seven years. The proposals are, I believe, widely supported in the House and were referred to this week by my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary of State for the Home Department in his speech to the Association of Chief Police Officers conference.

As for treatment, we are making £6 million of additional money available this year for methadone treatment programmes and services for young people. Guidance will shortly be sent to local authorities and others on practical measures to reduce the scope for drugs entering rave and club premises, and to minimise the dangers that drugs may cause—all in the context that we need to be clear on the central message that the only safe drug is no drug at all. Mobilising the support of parents and businesses in that effort continues to be central to our work.

A new development which, I hope, will give further impetus to much that I have been talking about—including the role of drug action teams, the voluntary sector, parents and businesses—is the establishment, announced by the Prime Minister last month, of a £2 million drugs challenge fund. It is open to all drug action teams in England this year to put forward bids for money, with a substantial commitment, we hope, from local businesses—the private sector. That will be geared towards specific projects that will make a difference to local communities. They include arrest referral schemes, drug education projects and projects to reduce drug-related crime.

Drug action teams will shortly be invited to bid, and I look forward to agreeing a significant number of innovative and practical ideas. The fund will be administered by my officials in the central drugs co-ordination unit, working with colleagues across the Government. The fund was a central Government partnership, in that it was resourced by contributions from no fewer that four Government Departments, with a significant Treasury contribution.

All hon. Members know that drug misuse is such a complex problem that there is no magic wand to wave or soundbite solution. Recognising that, the Government's drugs strategy sets some specific and practical short-term tasks, but that is against the background of a much longer-term determination to eradicate the dealing that causes so much misery, to reduce health risks to victims, drug misusers and their families and, above all, to enable our young people to resist illegal drugs by giving them hard information and compelling facts.

Undoubtedly, that approach, with the continuing cross-party support that I have mentioned several times, will in time make a substantial difference. For the first time in our country, we have the firm structures to do so and the benchmarks to assess progress over time, not least as a result of the excellent work being undertaken by the police, schools, prison, probation and social services inspectorates. The strategy must now engage our communities at large, with the aim of enabling our young people to resist the false lure of drugs and ensuring that they get the best possible chance for a better life.

I commend the strategy to the House. Together with my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary of State for Health, who will reply to the debate, I shall listen carefully to the contributions that hon. Members make to further a cause that I am sure we all hold in common.

10.9 am

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): This is a welcome and timely debate. We should not only continue to monitor the developments of the Government's strategy, which we have consistently supported, but we should consider developments that have taken place in the 12 months since we last debated the subject—also on a Friday morning—assess the scale of the problem and keep it permanently under review. The Leader of the House was right to discuss those issues so thoughtfully.

The Leader of the House quoted some statistics on drug abuse and associated crime. Although both are often highly organised, a large volume of drug-related crime takes place at a very low level, which is nevertheless intolerable in many local communities. People commit burglaries and various other offences simply to obtain money to sustain their habit. That is a problem for all communities.

The Leader of the House rightly says that this is not an inner-city or urban problem. Many rural communities—towns, market towns and villages—suffer from the problems that beset urban communities in terms of drug abuse and all that goes with it, including crime.

We must be realistic about the extent of drug abuse, but it would be wrong to assume that, because there is a large-scale problem, we are being overwhelmed by it. We should not give in; the consequences would be far too serious.

Drug abuse wrecks young lives. Some lives are even lost as a result; some of the more publicised cases have been mentioned. I identify the Opposition with the remarks by the Leader of the House about the parents of Leah Betts and their great efforts since her tragic death. It is important that people realise that, although her case rightly received much publicity, very many young lives are lost, and many more young lives are wrecked, as a result of drug abuse.

We are right to worry about such highly publicised cases, but we should also worry about the effect on the lives of people who have nothing to do with drug abuse.

[Mr. George Howarth]

I shall hold a surgery in my constituency tonight, and I guarantee that two or three—perhaps one or two more—of the cases will be a problem related to drugs. I am sure that that is the case at other hon. Members' surgeries. It may be a couple living in a block of flats, the communal areas of which are used at night by young people abusing drugs. Problems result. They leave debris behind. Young mothers have spoken to me who are rightly concerned about coming out of their front door in the morning to find, in a communal area, used needles, the debris from heroin abuse, silver paper and so on. Drug abuse has a marked effect on the quality of the lives of innocent people who just happen to live in the area where it is going on.

Similarly, I have received complaints—and taken them up with the police and the local authority—from people who, night after night, have had to endure dealing going on at their gates or across the road in a shopping precinct. When it is drawn to their attention, the police—Merseyside police in my local authority area—respond magnificently, but people are made miserable by having to live cheek by jowl with dealing.

My local authority, Knowsley borough council—not uniquely, as many others do it—has adopted a firm policy, which I support. Anyone who is convicted of drug dealing in a council property is evicted. It is now routine. Whatever difficulties in the local process that might cause, I support the council in that, because it is intolerable for people to live cheek by jowl with drug dealing.

Last summer, a head teacher showed me around a school, not in my constituency but in Liverpool. There was a discreet area at the back of the school, out of view from the main road, which young people were using to abuse drugs at night when the school premises were closed. It was a primary school. Young children were coming into school every morning to find, in the back entrances to their school and around the play area, discarded needles, silver paper and all the horrendous debris that goes with drug abuse. They are the realities of the lives of innocent people who are affected by the problems.

In common with other Members of the House, I have received a copy of a briefing paper by the Standing Conference on Drug Abuse, which makes some interesting points. It welcomes, as we do, the strategy set out in "Tackling Drugs Together", but it draws attention to three areas of concern. I hope the Minister will comment on them.

First, SCODA says that the resources available to tackle the growing drug problem might not be adequate. The Leader of the House mentioned some additional resources, which we would join in welcoming, but there should be continuing evaluation to ensure that all the resources are in the right places so that we may continue to tackle the problem effectively.

Secondly, SCODA argues that the balance of priorities and expenditure between control and enforcement measures and the provision of education, prevention, treatment and care needs more thought. I would welcome any comments that could be made about that, if not this afternoon, in the coming months. That needs further consideration.

Thirdly, SCODA mentions the absence from drug strategies of the contribution that might be made by Government programmes in training, employment and housing. I do not want to make too much of that—I certainly do not want to use it to be overly critical—but obviously there are links between lack of opportunities in the economy, lack of a decent place to live and other social disadvantages, and drug abuse. It is not uniquely the case, but if people do not have much of a stake in life, it is much easier to drift into drug abuse than if they clearly have a stake.

I am not trying to get into a debate about the stakeholder economy, but I am often struck by the difference between my generation, who were teenagers in the 1960s, and the generation who are teenagers today. In those days, people of my generation had props, a stake in life—in my case, an apprenticeship. The expectation was that, if we behaved ourselves and did not get into too much trouble, life would gradually improve each year. That is not always clear in every community today. I do not say that to make a major political point, but there are connections between the extent of people's opportunities and their expectations of a career or even a family—in some cases even the possibility of family life is excluded. All those factors were powerful disincentives that stopped people getting involved in drugs and crime. In many communities those disincentives no longer exist as comprehensively as they did in the 1960s.

The Leader of the House has repeated the argument about legalisation and decriminalisation. I firmly place on record again the fact that we support his argument.

Lady Olga Maitland: I welcome the fact that the hon. Gentleman supports my right hon. Friend on the issue of the decriminalisation of drugs. Will the hon. Gentleman therefore condemn the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), who has clearly hinted that she favours the decriminalisation of drugs? I say "hint" because I give her some benefit of the doubt, but the truth is that she has said that there should be "taxing and selling" of

"cannabis in a separate place than hard drugs".

She said that we should look at that possibility.Will the hon. Gentleman utterly condemn the hon. Lady because it outrageous that a public person should make that statement when so many young lives are at risk?

Mr. Howarth: As I recall, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) argued, and then retracted—[Hon. Members: "Ah!"] The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) should listen to what I have to say—she has asked me a question. My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood argued that a royal commission should be established. The Opposition's position, which I have consistently maintained, is that there is no point in establishing a royal commission because that implies that, if it argued in favour of decriminalisation or legalisation, we would be willing to accept it. I can see no circumstances in which the Labour party would accept that, so I see no argument for a royal commission.

As the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam has chosen to introduce my hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood into the argument, perhaps she will tell me whether she agrees with the vice-chairman of the Conservative party, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), who said in his book, "Saturn's Children":

"Logic suggests that the only completely effective way to ameliorate the"— drug—

"problem, and especially the crime which results from it, is to bring the industry into the open by legalising the distribution and consumption of all dangerous drugs, or at the very least decriminalising their consumption."

Does the hon. Lady agree with the vice-chairman of the Conservative party?

Hon. Members: He is not the vice-chairman.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I think that the House knows my views on seated interventions. It would be appropriate if each hon. Member sought to advance his or her own arguments.

Mr. Howarth: It was not I who chose to introduce the note of discord into the debate, Madam Deputy Speaker. To make it clear: that quote that I gave is contained in a book that the parliamentary private secretary to the chairman of the Conservative party wrote less than two years ago. Does the hon. Lady agree with him or is she willing to condemn him?

Mr. Simon Hughes: Just before we leave what is, I suppose, the inevitable outcome of such a debate—party-political point scoring—may I ask whether the hon. Gentleman accepts that we gain nothing by identifying differences of view within parties on such a subject? There are differences of view within each party represented in the House. He has clearly put the view of the Labour Front Bench, the Government have put their view, and I shall put my party's view. It would be a nonsense society if, when the Front-Bench team of each party put its view, every member of that party had to hold and express the same view. If that were the case, we might as well live in a totalitarian state where democracy and debate were not allowed.

Mr. Howarth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is up to him to defend his party's position; I am putting the Labour party's official position. It had not been my intention to give that quote; I was seeking to be as consensual as the Leader of the House, but as the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam chose to introduce one of my colleagues into the debate, I thought it wise to introduce one of hers. I agree that the more consensus on the issue that we have across the House, the more likely we are to make progress—it is as simple as that. For that reason, the Leader of the House was generous enough to acknowledge that, on behalf of the Opposition, I have consistently supported the Government in that. We shall continue to do so as that is the only way in which we can deal with the problems.

I should like to say a few more words about the case against the legalisation and decriminalisation. We should not underestimate the power of the argument for legalisation and decriminalisation. It sends entirely the wrong message to young people—it tells them that it is okay to do this. Officialdom, represented through Parliament or the Government, is seen to be saying that it is okay—it is not okay. It is a serious problem.

Mr. Flynn: To follow the logic of my hon. Friend's views on the main killer drugs of society, is he in favour of prohibiting alcohol and cigarettes?

Mr. Howarth: I have been down that path with my hon. Friend before and I have said on more than one occasion that, on this issue, he shows an uncharacteristic attachment to market forces. There are problems with alcohol abuse and with tobacco abuse, but there are different ways of dealing with them. Unfortunately, both those activities are long established and legal—if the starting point was different, we might deal differently with the problems. Although at some points in history some drugs that are now illegal were legal, most drugs that are in general use have been illegal for a considerable time. We have to deal with the position as it is rather than as my hon. Friend might prefer it to be.

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is well known among professionals that the thrill of illegality is part of the attraction of drugs to some young people? The difficulty is that decriminalisation removes the thrill of illegality for a certain sort of young person who could be tempted to use harder and yet more dangerous drugs.

Mr. Howarth: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument, but we could extend that principle to almost anything. We could say that stealing cars and joyriding produces a thrill—I know that the hon. Gentleman would not suggest that—so we should think of decriminalising that activity. People get a kick out of all sorts of illegal activities, but that does not necessarily justify decriminalising them.

The experience of areas where there have been experiments with decriminalisation shows that it causes confusion in policing. If some substances are decriminalised while others remain illegal, police forces and those responsible for dealing with the problem find it confusing. If some substances are dealt with on a legal basis while others are dealt with on an illegal basis, it becomes difficult to keep track of who is selling what to whom, where and when.

Those who support decriminalisation must recognise that, if we decriminalise in one country, one city or one area, we inevitably produce a magnetic effect. That is the experience in Holland. I would not support the argument, but those who do so must understand that unless they are prepared to support it on a co-ordinated, almost international basis in order to prevent the magnet effect, the inevitable consequence would be that the city or area of decriminalisation would attract more and more people because they would know that they could indulge in drug abuse with relative impunity. That would be true were London or any of the constituencies represented here to introduce decriminalisation. That is the experience in other countries, but it is certainly not an experience that I would recommend.

I acknowledge that there are considerable problems in getting the message across to young people. I return to the point made by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds

[Mr. Howarth]

(Mr. Spring) a few moments ago. Fashions change and young people's perception of what is acceptable or not changes. There are many pressures on young people now, from the media, from the music they listen to and from the clubs to which they go for entertainment, which make it seem acceptable for them to do certain things. The argument advanced about Ecstasy by the Leader of the House illustrated that point.

Young people need to be aware that whatever the dictates of fashion in certain areas and whatever the music might say, drugs such as Ecstasy are very dangerous. The case of Leah Betts is not the only example of the damage that drugs can do; in her case, the result was fatal.

There is a case—I know that there is consensus on this—for explaining to young people who are liable to find themselves offered drugs how they can reduce the harm that they might do to themselves. It is, for example, important that water is available. But we should not explicitly encourage young people, either through fashion or by other means, to believe that everything is all right if they take Ecstasy in a certain setting. It is not because it can lead to horrendous consequences.

The Leader of the House rightly referred to the problems of drug abuse in the Prison Service. I am sure that he is aware that when mandatory drug testing was introduced—

Mr. Flynn: Quite right.

Mr. Newton: I think that the hon. Gentleman is probably talking about the problems of drug abuse in prisons rather than in the Prison Service.

Mr. Howarth: I stand corrected. I am not sure what evidence my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) has for saying that I was absolutely right. I apologise if my remark was misleading. I of course meant that drug abuse was a problem in prisons and, for that reason, we supported the introduction of mandatory drug testing. It has been useful in identifying the scale of the problem within individual prisons.

I tabled a question for written answer to which I received an answer on 22 May 1996 at columns 243-44; it makes interesting reading. The number of drugs tests carried out between February and October 1995, on a month-by-month basis, went from 207 to 717. In February 1995, the number of tests that proved positive was 78, of which five showed the presence of opiates and 70 showed the presence of cannabis. By February 1996, the number of positive tests for cannabis had risen to 791 and the number of positive tests for opiates was 178.

I do not use those statistics to be alarmist, but because they give us an idea of the scale of the problem. I know that the Home Office and the Prison Service monitor the results regularly to ensure that mandatory drug testing and the procedures for arresting the supply of drugs in prisons are going well. What worries me—the statistics show this—is that there is a problem with mandatory drug testing in that cannabis can be detected in the bloodstream for much longer than opiates. It may well be—the figures are too small to say this conclusively—that some prisoners are shifting away from cannabis, which can be detected for longer, towards opiates. I do not say that as a political point. However, it is important that the results are monitored and if that shift is taking place, we must consider what routines need to be introduced to try to monitor the problem slightly differently.

Mr. Flynn: I raised the matter with the Home Office 10 months ago. As a result of the huge choice of drugs in prisons—illegal drug use is endemic in almost all our prisons—prisoners can move freely from soft drugs to hard drugs. There is evidence from prisoners themselves that the drug examinations are persuading them to come off cannabis and to go on to heroin.

Mr. Howarth: I agree with my hon. Friend up to a point. However, I am not sure that the evidence is clear enough to enable us to make further conclusions. That shift could be going on and my point—I know that the Prison Service and the Home Office are concerned about this—is that we must keep a clear eye on the situation. If it becomes apparent that there is a need to change the procedures and to consider using different kinds of test, we should keep an open mind.

There is an argument that we need to consider further proposals on how to stem the flow of drugs into our prisons, and I have a suggestion to put this morning. I believe that there is scope for further action to stem the extensive drug abuse in prisons. It is simply unacceptable that people with a history of drug abuse are still able to gain access to drugs within prisons. More worrying still is the fact that many convicted prisoners develop a drug habit while they are in prison. We have seen the chief inspector's reports on, to take an extreme example, Styal prison where the level of drug abuse admitted by prisoners was up to 90 per cent. We would all agree that that is unacceptable. Over time, the objective should be to achieve an entirely drug-free prison estate.

Perhaps we should start the process by designating four or five totally drug-free prisons, following consultation with the Prison Service. Last week, I had the opportunity to talk to Mr. Tilt, the Director General of the Prison Service. He believes that it would be perfectly feasible to start by designating four or five drug-free prisons and then gradually to expand the number so that we had a totally drug-free prison estate. I realise that that would not be simple to achieve, but I believe that we could make a start.

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. Is he aware that Downview prison, which is on the edge of my constituency, had a very active drug rehabilitation programme? I can safely say that the prison is almost drug free and could be regarded as a pilot and a leader for other prisons to follow.

Mr. Howarth: If the hon. Lady had waited a few minutes, she would have realised that I intended to go on to talk about Downview, which I had the opportunity to visit earlier this year. The hon. Lady is right; the crucial point about Downview is that the staff are very careful about who is allowed into the prison, which is in effect a drug-free prison.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): A better class of prisoner.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman should not be so flippant because this is a serious subject.

For the process to work, one needs to accept in the prisons concerned only people who positively want to come off drugs or who can demonstrate that they are already free of them. I congratulate Downview because it is an excellent prison and its work is first class.

Another important aspect of the solution, of which the Prison Service is aware, is to deal with the families of those who have a drug problem. Someone can go through a drug rehabilitation programme while he is in prison only for him to come out to the same environment and the same family circumstances. His partner may be involved in drug abuse and all the good work can be undone in 24 hours.

Mr. Fabricant: I wish to ask a genuine question, because I do not claim to be an expert on the subject. I and my colleagues do not understand why every visitor to every prison is not thoroughly searched to ensure that drugs are not brought in. There would be no drugs in prison if everyone was carefully searched. Why does that not happen?

Mr. Howarth: I feel like my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) must feel at Prime Minister's Question Time when he is asked to answer for the Government.

Mr. Fabricant: It was a genuine question.

Mr. Howarth: I accept that. I have probably visited more prisons as shadow Home Affairs spokesman than anybody in the House—even more, I suspect, than the Home Secretary—and I have raised that very question with the Prison Service. The problem is that the Prison Service would have to carry out highly intrusive searches. It would be difficult for me to explain graphically to the House the extent to which visitors will go to conceal drugs. If the hon. Gentleman cares to use his imagination, he will realise that the nature of the human anatomy means that there are places in which people can conceal drugs that makes it difficult to find them. That is not to say that the Prison Service should not be ever more vigilant and it makes increasing use of sniffer dogs and other methods.

Some months ago, I visited Whitemoor prison, which is probably one of the most security conscious prisons in Britain and possibly in Europe, for reasons that the House will understand. It has elaborate procedures for visitors, so much so that when I visited the prison a group of partners of prisoners lobbied me on my way in to complain about how intrusive the search procedures were. When I met the governor, he showed me some video evidence of how drugs were passed from visitors to prisoners. The House would be amazed at the lengths to which some visitors will go to pass drugs over.

I find it curious that people should want to help their loved ones in prison by providing them with drugs. I do not think that is sensible, but people do it. I understand from the police and the prison authorities that pressures are put on the partners of prisoners by those associated with other inmates, and that they are taking drugs in because they are frightened not to. That problem must be dealt with.

If we had four to five drug-free prisons, we could build on work that has been done already in some prisons which have drug-free wings. I accept that some conditions would need to be attached to such prisons. For example, entrance to drug-free prisons should be strictly controlled and those already serving custodial sentences would have to demonstrate, through regular voluntary drug tests, that they were clean. Similarly, those embarking on a custodial sentence who wanted to opt into a drug-free regime would have to demonstrate that they had not previously been involved in drug abuse.

We should make a start and gradually build from four or five drug-free prisons—the Director General of the Prison Service believes that that is a feasible proposal—so that eventually over time we could envisage a totally drug-free prison estate.

The Leader of the House made another important point about supply reduction. I have had the opportunity in the past 12 months, on more than one occasion, to visit Merseyside police and those responsible for dealing with organised crime in the Metropolitan police force. I too pay tribute to the excellent work that they do and to the fact that they are forging partnerships with Customs and Excise, local authorities and other bodies.

The Leader of the House acknowledged that there is still more scope for greater co-operation between the various bodies involved in solving the problem of illegal drugs. I agree that the co-operation between Customs and Excise and the police, which has advanced, needs to be more structured in the future. There is evidence that clashes of culture about methods of work have made those bodies less effective than they might otherwise have been. That is not a criticism, because I accept that it is difficult for two separate organisations to work closely together. They are conscious of the need for greater co-ordination and co-operation and we must consider the sort of structures that might deliver that.

Mr. Newton: I seek to intervene in the same constructive way as the hon. Gentleman has approached the subject, for which I am grateful. While there is always scope for improved co-operation, recent events have been encouraging. For example, a couple of months ago, Customs and Excise and the police held a joint press conference—they asked me to take the chair—to announce their drug seizure figures. I believe that they intend to do the same next year. The fact that they are holding joint press conferences on a subject on which, frankly speaking, they used to compete with each other is encouraging. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would wish to join me in paying tribute to two people who have been especially involved in that improved co-operation—Keith Hellawell of the Association of Chief Police Officers and Dick Kellaway of Customs and Excise.

Mr. Howarth: I certainly join the Leader of the House to pay tribute to those two gentlemen. I was not seeking to criticise, but there is always scope for greater co-operation between the police and Customs and Excise. The development of the national criminal intelligence service should be added to the equation, because it does useful work collating and disseminating information. NCIS is already built into the structure to a great extent, but more could be done.

I have talked to senior police officers who are involved in the fight against drugs and they are frustrated. It is easy and sometimes effective to target local drug dealers on the streets, but it is difficult to go after the drug barons, for want of a better word, and those who control the whole enterprise. The problem is that the trail that leads to the drug barons includes money, but it often does not include drugs. It is difficult—hence the need for co-ordination and co-operation—to target the people who are ultimately responsible for the organisation of huge drug operations. To illustrate that, I can give an example. I had the opportunity last summer to spend some time with the Merseyside police drugs squad. It carried out a successful operation at a nightclub, which took about three months, and involved the use of off-duty uniformed police officers, in civilian clothes so that they would be less likely to be recognised. The squad collected a huge amount of evidence in that nightclub where Ecstasy and other substances were being sold. Eventually, the operation was closed down, and the dealers were arrested inside the club, convicted and sent to prison. Within two weeks, the dealing operation in that club was back in business. The local authority and the police co-operated in relation to licensing in an attempt to deal with the problem. I have used that example to illustrate how structured an industry it is—within a week or two, it totally replaced the network that it had to sell its product. We should never under-estimate just how organised it is.

There are other examples of how drug dealers use otherwise innocent people to rent mobile phones for them, so that they cannot easily be traced; and of how they pay people for a bit of space under some stairs, so that a hold-all can be stored and picked up by someone at a certain time. A lot of money is involved in the industry, and the dealers are willing to spread it around to protect themselves. It is difficult to target them. Co-operation is needed to close down, as far as is possible, people who are dealing at a high level.

At some point in the future, it may be necessary to give some fairly draconian powers to the police and to Customs and Excise to deal with the phenomenon. I shall not make any specific suggestions today. I realise the scale of the problem. If we need fresh approaches to dealing with, for example, money laundering, organised crime, and the way in which violence is often used to underpin the operations, we shall be willing to co-operate, subject to what is contained in the proposals. The closing down of one big operation is more likely to have an effect on the industry than 30 or 40 arrests on the street—important and necessary though they may be.

Finally, like the Leader of the House, I refer to the various treatment programmes—whether they be in prisons such as Downview or in the wider community. It is important to pay tribute to the many and varied programmes that are available, the many organisations that run them and the many ways in which people are helped to come off drugs. However, there is almost an echo of Mao Tse-tung—let a thousand flowers bloom—in this regard.

We have got to the point where almost anyone who says, "I have got a drug rehabilitation programme" is encouraged and welcomed—not necessarily by the Government, but perhaps by local government or by charitable funding. However, we do not seem to evaluate what works and what does not work. I know that the Department of Health does some work in this regard, and I am sure that it will continue. I believe that a major study, at national level, is required so that we can evaluate every kind of programme and see how successful they are.

For example, while I do not condemn the use of methadone, some people are beginning to believe that there must be a cut-off point at which people can be removed from methadone and have no dependency whatsoever. We should constantly evaluate and re-evaluate the success of the programmes. I am sure that that is a point in common among all hon. Members, and I am sure that it will happen.

Mr. Fabricant: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with me that, from time to time, we need to reassess the functions of certain drugs? For example, while I oppose the use of marijuana as a drug, some medical practitioners argue that it is an effective ameliorant for people suffering from multiple sclerosis.

Mr. Howarth: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should ask his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Battersea, that question. As I understand it—although I am not entirely certain—the Department of Health is funding a research programme into whether there is a medical advantage in the use of cannabis for those suffering from multiple sclerosis. I am not entirely convinced that that medical case has been established. However, if it could be established, I would have no problem with it and I am sure that the Department of Health would not have a problem with it. The argument that the hon. Gentleman is advancing has not been entirely scientifically proven. If and when it is, I would not have any objection to the use of cannabis for medical purposes.

The importance of the debate cannot be understated. I agree with the Leader of the House that no magic wand can be waved. It is important that there is a responsible agreement, wherever possible, between us on a number of key issues. First, it is not acceptable, in any circumstances, for young people to believe that taking drugs is somehow a good thing to do. We would be irresponsible if we advanced that argument, and I am certainly not prepared to do so.

Secondly, we should send out as powerful a message as possible to those who are responsible for this industry that it will not be tolerated, that whatever means are necessary to combat it will be made available, that whatever co-operation between agencies to combat it will be given and, most important of all, that those of us who have a responsibility in the House—and, by extension, those in Government—to oversee these things will not give in.

There is a war against drug abuse and drug dealing—and I think that we can ultimately win that war. So long as we hold on to that view and act accordingly, we will be behaving responsibly and, more importantly, we will be showing the wider community that drug abuse is a bad thing and that those who perpetrate it, support it and organise it are against the wider interests of the community, particularly those of young people.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk): I shall concentrate on the situation in East Anglia and Norfolk, mention my views on the problems in prisons and refer to a specific problem that involves one of my constituents who runs a drug treatment clinic. As the Leader of the House pointed out, the tragedy of drugs is there for everyone to see. There are approximately 35,000 registered addicts—and obviously the effect on crime is horrendous.

I recently met the deputy chief constable of the Norfolk constabulary. I asked him what percentage of crime in Norfolk is in some way drug related, and he said between 60 and 70 per cent. I am sure that a similar percentage would apply to Suffolk, to Lincolnshire and to other shire counties. It is an appalling figure.

As the Leader of the House pointed out, illegal drug use among young people is at its highest recorded level. I welcome the White Paper, particularly its emphasis on mobilising local communities, the guidance given to schools and the enhanced teacher training. A large number of resources are currently going into controlling the drug problem: £346 million goes to enforcement and control, and £61 million to treatment services—perhaps a little more money should be spent on treatment services. I hope that the Under–Secretary of State for Health will comment on that in his reply.

I also welcome the Government's action on the criminal law front, particularly the fact that proceeds from the drug trade can now be taken away completely and that there is no possibility of drug dealers and traffickers benefiting from their crimes.

Let us examine the Government's fight against drugs. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 increased the maximum sentence for trafficking from 14 years to life. Labour voted against it. The Criminal Justice Act 1993 introduced measures on the confiscation of profits and Labour voted against them. The recent White Paper on sentencing published by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary rightly proposes minimum sentences for drug traffickers and dealers, but it has received very little support from the Opposition.

At last year's Conservative party conference, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister launched a new initiative when he said that it was ridiculous that the security services could not be used in the fight against drugs. He promised to take action on that and legislation has been introduced this Session, but once again we have received absolutely no support from the Opposition. They may be long on words and promises, but they are very short on support and definable action in the House in support of Government initiatives. Once again, Labour is saying one thing and doing something completely different.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) mentioned the legalisation of cannabis. I have examined the matter in considerable detail, but although the arguments can be quite compelling, I am also absolutely convinced that the evidence in the other direction is even stronger. The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Sir Paul Condon, said:

"This is not simply a moral issue . . . It is also about the kind of society that we want for our children. I do not want one where it is acceptable to be 'stoned' on drugs, or where we pop into the cannabis shop to get an evening's supply."

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House mentioned the example of Holland, where soft drugs are legalised. It can be argued that drug enforcement and action against traffickers is focused on hard drugs, but on the other hand the evidence that the use of soft drugs can lead to hard drugs is completely overwhelming. For the record, let me state categorically that I am opposed to the legalisation of cannabis.

I should like to turn briefly to prisons. The Leader of the House mentioned that he was in Norfolk the other day and visited Wayland prison. There are a number of prisons in Norfolk: Wayland prison, Norwich prison and Whitemoor prison. I visited Whitemoor prison quite recently and I am in close touch with many prison officers in my constituency.

I was surprised by what the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), the shadow spokesperson, as he describes himself, said about prisons and trying to make five prisons drug free. Every single prison should be drug free. On the admission of the hon. Gentleman, if there are five drug-free prisons, there must be about 99 prisons that are not.

I understand the points that the hon. Gentleman made about the difficulty of searching visitors to prisons, but every prison officer I have spoken to in my constituency has made it clear that it is not the prison officers or the prisoners who bring drugs into prisons. Visitors bring drugs into prisons and that should be stopped. If it means having closed visits in most prisons, so be it. If it means that every single meeting between any visitor and any prisoner should be recorded by cameras, so be it.

In Whitemoor, there is now an operations monitoring room where cameras watch every move of every single visitor. Whenever there was a suspicious incident, the previous governor of Whitemoor prison often took the view that, in the interests of keeping the peace, there should be no intervention or disruption even if it meant the passing over of a suspicious package. However, I am pleased to say that the new governor is adopting a much tougher regime. If there is any possibility of anything untoward or suspicious happening, there is an immediate clampdown.

Mr. Spring: Does my hon. Friend agree that the excessive bowing down to the civil rights lobby in the past made it difficult to search visitors and the net effect of that is been an outbreak of drug taking in prisons, which is hugely damaging to society? Does he agree that it is about time that we improved our searching methods in the way that he has suggested?

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend, who represents a constituency very close to mine, is absolutely correct. My discussions with Brody Clarke, the governor of Whitemoor, bear that out 100 per cent.

The latest figures that I have relate to 1994 when there were 6,880 drug busts inside prisons and officers seized nearly 5,000 stashes of cannabis, 300 of heroin, 101 of cocaine and 57 of LSD. Those figures are absolutely horrendous. The Prisoners Resource Service estimates that half all inmates consume drugs at some stage during imprisonment.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North mentioned urine testing. Mike Trace, a director of the Prisoners Resource Service said that there is a possibility that prisoners will be encouraged to switch from cannabis to drugs that are not revealed by the tests. On the other hand, tough action must be taken. Random testing in prisons was introduced by the Public Order and Criminal Justice

[Mr. Bellingham]

Act 1994. It was opposed by the Opposition. We need a combination of random tests, but we also must also have a much tougher policy towards visitors.

Mr. George Howarth: I should correct the hon. Gentleman. The mandatory drug testing of prisoners was introduced in a statutory instrument. I led for the Opposition and we voted for it.

Mr. Bellingham: I am always pleased for the Opposition to correct me when I criticise them, and I stand corrected. However, that does not mean that the Opposition did not vote against virtually every other tough measure that the Government have introduced.

Let me turn briefly to Norfolk, where the challenge of the drugs problem has been picked up by the Norfolk constabulary, which is operating a number of excellent schemes, the local education authority and the probation service. I should like to congratulate the Norfolk constabulary on its efforts. The police are well aware of the problems in Norfolk.

I mentioned the figure given to me by the deputy chief constable relating to the number of crimes that involve drugs in some respect and I hope that what is happening in Norfolk is being reflected elsewhere in the country. A concerted effort is being made by the police, the probation service and the education authority to bring drugs education into schools and local communities. Whenever there is a presentation on home watch, crime prevention or anything else, the Norfolk constabulary makes sure that a key expert is on hand to give a presentation and explain what Norfolk constabulary is doing and how it is working with other agencies and the drug action team. I welcome that action and the resources that are going into it.

One of my constituents who lives in Norfolk for some of the time, runs Fairways, a drug treatment centre in Docklands that was set up four years ago. I have been privileged to visit Dr. Adrian Garfoot, the medical director, James West, the practice manager and Gary Sutton, the drugs field researcher.

The centre opened four years ago. Dr. Garfoot's father, the Rev. John Garfoot, is a minister in Kings Lynn in my constituency. Dr. Garfoot began his career as a general practitioner, but he was so concerned about and committed to people who suffer from drug addiction that he wanted to do more for them. Therefore, he moved from general practice to treating drug addicts on a permanent basis. The clinic has a unique prescribing policy: Dr. Garfoot believes in providing sufficient prescriptions to wean addicts off their habit for street drugs.

Presently 261 patients attend the clinic and they had spent on average £100 per day feeding their habit. About 70 per cent. of the male patients had spent an average of four years in prison. We all know the costs associated with incarceration and the ill health that flows from drug addiction. Many of the patients had been refused treatment by other doctors—that fact was brought home to me when I visited the clinic recently—and many had attended drug dependency units and detoxification centres that had failed to help them. It is a classic example of short-term treatment simply not working.

The clinic aims to try to return such people to the mainstream. It aims, first, to stabilise drug habits through a tight prescribing regimen and, secondly, to rebuild people's lives and try to help them back into the community. An integral part of the programme is the Lost Talents charity, which was set up by Dr. Garfoot. It tries to rebuild the talents and the skills that have been lost during the period of addiction.

In 1994, my constituent Dr. Adrian Garfoot was charged under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 with prescribing in an irresponsible manner. The charges related mainly to the prescribing of amphetamines. The case went before a tribunal, which reached its conclusions in October 1994. However, it is now June 1996 and there has been no ministerial view regarding the tribunal's ruling. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to comment about that delay. My constituent continues his work, day in and day out, treating cases that were considered to be hopeless. He seeks to return his patients to the mainstream community, to give them hope for the future and to help them to rebuild their lives. However, Ministers have not got their act together and reached a decision about the tribunal's conclusions.

Worse still, on 22 May this year there was a raid on the clinic. The conduct of that raid is particularly disturbing. Seven police officers arrived at the clinic and arrested my constituent and his partner. They removed virtually all the documentation and the confidential records held at the centre. It was an extremely unfortunate incident which took place without warning. Examination of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and relevant sections of other Acts reveals that, if my constituent had not been arrested, the police would have had to obtain an order under section 9 of the 1984 Act and a search warrant.

It appears that the police were on a fishing expedition and I wonder whether the drugs inspectorate and people in the Home Office knew what was going on. I find it extraordinary that, before a Minister has made up his mind about a tribunal decision—there is no evidence against my constituent; I would not say that in the House unless I had checked my facts very carefully—seven police officers from No. 3 area intelligence unit at Ilford police station should raid the clinic, creating mayhem and causing much concern among patients.

I am pleased to report that most of the documents have been returned to Dr. Garfoot. However, some material—particularly computer records and bank statements—has not been returned, and obviously my constituent is seeking a full explanation. I wrote to the Home Office Minister about the matter approximately three weeks ago and I have not yet received a reply. I also wrote to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, but he has not replied to my letter. This is a specific constituency matter and I would be grateful if my hon. Friend could discuss it with his hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) and arrange for speedy replies to my correspondence. I would also be grateful if my hon. Friend would comment generally about whether a raid of that nature should take place before a Minister has made up his mind about the case.

I am sorry for having been diverted into raising an important constituency issue. Sufficient resources must be allocated to treatment in the fight against drugs and implementation of the Government's drugs strategy. I am convinced, through my experiences with Dr. Garfoot, that the treatment of drug addicts and drug offenders is crucial. That treatment must be combined with a tough policy of action against drug traffickers and dealers and a tough sentencing policy. I support the Government's drugs policy. I hope that it will continue and that it will begin to have an impact on this terrible national problem.

11.15 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I welcome the debate. I hope that we shall continue to have an annual debate about drugs for as long as it continues to be a huge national issue. It is appropriate that we should return to it a year after the debate that followed the introduction of the Government's report by the Leader of the House.

I hope that hon. Members can contribute to the drugs debate. I said earlier to the Leader of the House by way of intervention that possibly the media make the greatest contribution to that debate. For example, I believe that in the past year the film "Trainspotting" probably made the most dramatic contribution in that regard. It depicted real-life incidents in a breathtaking manner. When I saw the film at the cinema, I remember how the audience collectively drew breath during several scenes. It certainly did not pull any punches.

The film was particularly effective in drawing attention to the high incidence of illegal drug taking in Scotland, which is where the film was based and where its characters came from. Although the debate principally concerns England and Wales—there are no Scottish Members of Parliament in the Chamber today—I do not think that we should fail to mention the fact that hon. Members from Scotland across all political parties are trying to ensure that the debate also takes place in a Scottish context. My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), the Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) went on a train trip around Scotland, taking the drugs message to all communities. Their action is to be commended.

One could cite many figures in this debate, but I shall be selective and refer to only two documents—both of which I welcome. I refer first to the updated document from the Standing Conference on Drug Abuse which, as the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) said, was prepared as a briefing for hon. Members. The organisation is based in my constituency and I pay tribute to its work. Secondly, I draw attention to the excellent report produced recently by the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology. I pay tribute to that body, to our colleagues who serve on it and to the staff who work with them. They do the most excellent work. I regret that I was not able to find time to serve on that body when I was asked to do so.

That body produced a report in May this year, which I commend to hon. Members and to the wider community. The report on cannabis, Ecstasy, amphetamines and LSD is an up-to-date and accurate scientific analysis of the current situation. I shall cite several statistics from that report and from SCODA's document, which I hope will put the issue into context.

As the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) said, illegal drug abuse among young people is currently at its highest recorded level. The report says that between one third and one half of 16-year-olds have experimented with illegal drugs. According to the report, lifetime experience of drugs is more than one in four of the adult population; perhaps as many as 7 million people in this country have tried cannabis at some point in their lives, while between 250,000 and 800,000 young people may have tried Ecstasy; and about one in five young people use drugs on a regular monthly basis. Equally important is the last statistic on its list. Drug taking, of course, is not just one way—many people stop of their own volition. In one survey, of the 32 per cent. of 17 and 18-year-olds who had tried an illegal drug, 10 per cent. no longer took it.

We should recognise that the statistic for those who stop drug taking is just as important—and certainly more encouraging—as the one for those who start to take drugs. According to the POST report, there may have been 50 to 100 acute deaths over the past five years as a result of taking Ecstasy. I shall quote, for the purpose of being absolutely accurate:

> "Those seeking to down-play the risk could compare it with the risks of being killed in a traffic accident (of a similar magnitude)".

It is, of course, more difficult to opt out of traffic-related accidents than it is to opt out of taking Ecstasy, where people opt in by taking it. The report continues:

> "Others would compare a tolerance of 20 deaths a year with society's reluctance to accept even slightly enhanced risks in other fields—whether contraceptive pills or beef."

We must get the balance right, as the Leader of the House has carefully tried to do in all his public statements, and ensure that we neither over-exaggerate nor underplay the risks.

Mr. Flynn: I share the hon. Gentleman's admiration for that report, but I must point out that the official figure—which the Department has given me after several questions—for the number of deaths in the past five years in Great Britain, in which Ecstasy was mentioned as one of the poisons involved, is 54. The number of deaths in which Ecstasy was the only drug mentioned and therefore was the cause was 34.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The figures that he gives are not inconsistent with what the report says and what I have said.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk quoted his county's statistics for drug-related crime. The latest figure that I have is that, nationally, about two thirds of crime is drug related. That is a huge figure, and it does not include crimes such as taking drugs or being convicted of supply. I am talking about burglaries, car thefts and so on.

The last set of statistics—again, I am trying neither to up-play them nor to down-play them—come from the SCODA report, which says that 32 per cent. of adults cite social deprivation as the main cause of problem drug use; boredom, 28 per cent.; peer pressure, 24 per cent.; and personal or family problems, 20 per cent. Only 2 per cent. saw criminal tendencies as a root cause. That is important. It is not an activity of criminals. It is not an activity of people who, psychologically, have a criminal tendency.

The Home Office "British Crime Survey 1996" highlighted that unemployment and poor housing are major factors associated with opiate use in the 20 to 29 age group. I have two more figures. Thirty-nine per cent. of people using drugs in public places are homeless. That survey was from the north-west of England, but it is three years out of date. According to the Department of Health's figures for last year, 75 per cent. of the drug users using drugs services had been unemployed in the two years before treatment, so we must be realistic about the skew in terms of people who in some way are socially disadvantaged.

One of the saddest aspects of modern crime is that crimes are often committed by young people and young adults on other people, particularly the elderly. The Met and other police forces have rightly tried to target crimes of violence against the person, such as street robbery. Many of those crimes are drug related. People on drugs do not behave in the way that they would if they were not on drugs. Their behaviour is sometimes entirely unacceptable. If they behave like animals, the sooner we realise that they should be dealt with severely, the better.

Sadly, this country is awash with legal and illegal drugs. My colleagues sometimes have a go at me for being a health spokesman who has probably used the health service less than anybody else, and who would not take a drug if he could avoid it from one year to the next, whether it is aspirin or anything else. Let me put the issue into context. There are far too many drugs in use. Far too many are prescribed by doctors who see them as an easy way out. Far too many are in general use in the health service, because they have been sold as a quick remedy. Far too many are improperly used. I include legal, harmful drugs—predominantly tobacco, alcohol and, I suppose, caffeine, although I am less certain about caffeine and its implications.

I hope that, as a nation, we shall resolve to reduce the amount of drugs that are in use. Of course, some drugs, such as penicillin, are vital, but many people are given drugs simply to keep them quiet, and non-drug-related remedies are often much better.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon) indicated assent.

Mr. Hughes: I see the hon. Gentleman, who is a general practitioner, nodding. I am grateful for his silent assent.

Common to the promotion of many legal drugs by the drug companies; to the promotion of tobacco and alcohol; and to the promotion of illegal drugs, is profit. There is a hell of a lot of money to be made out of drugs. If we recognise that, we shall realise more clearly what is going on.

In that context, the Government are still entirely inconsistent about tobacco—that is the only criticism that I shall make of the Government today. Tobacco-related diseases kill 100,000 people a year. Yet we allow tobacco to be advertised. Whether we should turn back the clock and make it illegal is a different question, but it is bad that we allow it to be promoted. It is totally unacceptable and obscene that we allowed the Archbishop Michael Ramsay secondary school in my borough to take £250,000 from British American Tobacco as part of the package to become a city technology college. I know that the governors say that they could not get the money from anywhere else. I know that they anguished over it. I respect them. But to drive secondary schools in the inner city to take money from BAT-allied activity—money that came from the profit of tobacco largely sold abroad—is entirely unacceptable. I hope that someone outside who has £250,000—there are plenty of them in this country—will hear this debate and offer the school the money, so that it does not have to take the money from BAT. It would willingly take it from someone else.

The tragedy is that, accordingly to "The Health of the Nation" figures, the incidence of smoking among young people is on the increase, particularly among young women. I cannot understand how a young person can be expected to hear from a teacher, "Smoking is bad for you," while the school gets its money from the profits of smoking. To turn round a quotation that I think the Leader of the House gave, the only safe cigarette—I know that he smokes, so I am not having a personal go at him—is no cigarette. The only safe tobacco is no tobacco. If people choose to take those risks, fair enough, but in the end it is not helpful and it costs the health service a lot of money.

The people who profit from drugs are not in it because of any particular interest in them. They are the same people who, in the 1960s, did the armed robberies, in the 1970s made their money out of pornography, and who now realise that the easiest way to make their money is from drugs. If we banned alcohol, they would make a profit out of alcohol. So we need have no illusions about who they are.

As Mr. Hellawell, the Leader of the House, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and all the commentators say, this is a difficult problem and there is no easy answer. There is no magic answer to the problems of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, the pill, drugs to deal with malaria or baby milk. Those are all matters of science, and science develops. We keep getting more and different information. None of us deludes ourselves about that, and that is why the POST report and the report of the task force chaired by Rev. John Polkinghorne were so good and why SCODA does such good work.

I will not make a big thing of it—it is no big deal to me—but I must put into context why the Liberal Democrats took the view that there should be a royal commission to consider such issues. It was because science and the evidence change, as do the international consequences. That does not mean to say, however, that as a party we endorse the legalisation or decriminalisation of cannabis or any other drug. In a motion that stated that there should be tougher penalties for offenders and strengthened resources for Customs and Excise, we also took the view that the issue should be studied objectively.

The task force is an interesting recent model. It reported last month, and its strength was in its independence. It reflected all professions and walks of life, which is what gave it credibility. I would be happy for the public health commission to do that job—a body that does that job for food and drugs in general. If there were a royal commission to give us the information regularly, we the politicians could decide.

I would require the burden of proof to be in favour of decriminalisation before I supported it, and at the moment neither my colleagues nor I are persuaded, but such a commission would provide that sort of information.

Mr. Spring: I must point out an inconsistency. There is a clear link between cannabis and cancer. That link has become increasingly clear in a number of studies, particularly in the United States, and the hon. Gentleman will know that cannabis contains 70 per cent. more carcinogens than tobacco. Despite that link and the fact that it is so destructive of life—there is evidence of that among habitual marijuana smokers in California—and although the hon. Gentleman is virulently opposed to tobacco advertising, he is taking what is essentially a cop-out view by moving the problem on to a royal commission.

Mr. Hughes: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says about the cancer link. The House of Commons report last month made that abundantly clear. The medical and scientific evidence against cannabis is growing. I think that that is what an independent commission or task force would be saying, and I do not think that such a body would recommend legalisation, as the burden of evidence is moving against it. I believe, however, that we need a body that is not politically led or driven. That is why the Government got into such a mess and are still in such a mess over BSE—politics became enmeshed with science.

Mr. Newton: I am becoming increasingly puzzled by the line that the hon. Gentleman is taking. I agree with the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman that the biggest difficulty with setting up a royal commission is that it would send a signal that something needed to be changed and that the Government were looking for someone to tell them what changes to make. We do not think that that is the case, any more than the Opposition Front-Bench team does.

My point—before I go out of order, Madam Deputy Speaker—is that I do not understand what such a body would do that could not be done by the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs, which was set up under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

Mr. Hughes: I accept the validity of that point. The body could do exactly the same job on the limited issue of the misuse of drugs, but could also consider the wider issues—not merely illegal drugs and misuse, which is the relatively limited brief of the advisory council, but the safety of food and drugs, as the American Food and Drug Administration does. I believe that the Leader of the Opposition made a similar commitment on food in his speech in Harrogate yesterday.

I do not think that there is a lot between us. I am arguing that there should be a body to consider such matters, away from Government and politicians. The issue will not go away. Let me make it absolutely clear. The fact that, as a party, we believe that such a body should look into those matters does not mean that we believe that the answer is either yes or no. I am with the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and the Leader of the House when they say that they do not want to give signals that suggest that drug taking is—

Mr. George Howarth: That is what doing that would do.

Mr. Hughes: No, it would not. Setting up a constitutional body of the type that exists in the United States, Sweden and other countries does not mean that it would give us a different answer. It would simply review the evidence on a regular basis and give Parliament the opportunity to decide what to do. For the moment, I am not persuaded that the law ought to be changed, and that is my party's position.

Mr. Howarth: I realise that the hon. Gentleman has a difficult position to defend, but if one established a royal commission to carry out the functions that he described, that would be admitting at the very least the possibility that, if it concluded that cannabis should be legalised or decriminalised, that conclusion would be acceptable. I am not prepared to sign up to that proposition and nor is the Leader of the House. I gather that the hon. Gentleman is hoping that, if the body were established, it would not come up with that conclusion. To be honest, there are a lot of inconsistencies in what he is saying.

Mr. Hughes: Those who read the report of the debate can make their own judgment. I do not think that there are inconsistencies. There are committees on broadcasting standards and on all sorts of other areas of public life. They act independently and give advice. I do not know why we are so nervous on this issue. There are different academic, scientific and medical views.

Mr. Flynn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: No.

Mr. Flynn: My vote is in the balance.

Mr. Hughes: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a constituent of mine, but if I have not won his vote by now, I shall probably not win it by the next election.

Does criminalising and prosecuting producers and sellers imply that users should be dealt with in the same way? Does one benefit from calling the users criminals? Does one benefit from calling prostitutes criminals? Those are real questions. One has to be honest, and it is not necessarily helpful to put people into different categories.

Finally, as is recognised on both sides of the House, education is the way forward, particularly that of young people at school. More than anything else, I must commend the section of the POST report that makes what we need to do so clear. It states:

"Children learn most about drugs from Television, next most important are friends", with school education coming third. It points out that youth culture, such as advertising and magazines, is the way to get through to children. As has been said, we cannot win by saying that drugs are dangerous, because young people want to take risks, so that argument is not a winner.

The Health Education Authority got it absolutely right in its drugs campaign last year, by dealing with the health implications. Sixty-one per cent. of drug users say that worries about health are the biggest reason to stop using drugs. The HEA publicity:

"The most dangerous thing about drugs is what you don't know about them."

is the way to win the argument. That is a very effective campaign.

I have been playing around with other slogans. The best that I could come up with—I apologise for the plagiarism—was, "Ask not whether you should do drugs, ask rather what drugs could do to you." That is the issue. It is a question of giving young people the education, so that they can decide.

I hope that we can build up the resources and effectiveness of the Health Education Authority, which did a good job under the right hon. Member for Sutton

[Mr. Hughes]

Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) when AIDS and HIV were thought to be a big risk; we have become complacent about those problems and we need to build up that campaign again. We need effective campaigning on television and big posters using simple advertisements that do not say no to drugs but ask the sort of questions that young people can ask themselves. By way of a postscript, I believe that the dance industry has suffered. There could be a supplementary poster that said, "Raves yes, drugs no." Not everyone who goes dancing at weekends wants or uses drugs. It is a proper recreational activity from which drugs do not necessarily follow.

It is clear that social policy is relevant. The more that young people have jobs and training, and feel valued and wanted, the less they will need to find escape. I strongly support the Prime Minister's initiative to maximise opportunities for sport and recreation. The more healthy activity that young people can take part in, the better. That includes dance, a popular and worthwhile activity for people of all ages.

I represent a constituency as urban as that of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North, and he was right that the bane of the lives of many council estate residents—and I represent more of them than any other English Member—is the groups of young people who say that they are bored and have nothing to do. They are not necessarily into drugs, but they may get into them. They then become anti-social, threatening and difficult to control. They need sport and recreational opportunities to take the football, basketball and hanging around away from the middle of estates. I ask that we add to the money that we give the youth service and not only that given to big sports projects, but that given to Sports Council-funded projects in urban estates. I am about to put in such a bid for my area. We need to win the battle at the grass-roots, not nationally.

Customs and Excise needs to be supported. There have been moments when it has not felt supported. Its headquarters is in my constituency, though it has not briefed me for the debate. As the hon. Member for Knowsley, North said, as with many other matters, whatever we do nationally, it is difficult to influence the worldwide pattern because of international trends. We need effective Customs and Excise activity.

The police and the prisons need our support. I agree with the aim of making prisons drug-free. Prison is not very effective in dealing with drugs. The Americans have learned that locking people up is more expensive than dealing with them outside prison. Prison allows drugs to be spread around. I have two propositions. First, the Leader of the House and the Home Office should consider recycling the drug profits seized under the powers that the Government put through Parliament into dealing with drugs, by linking them to drug rehabilitation or education.

Secondly, the Government should examine the idea of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), who leads for us on home affairs, for drug courts. That again involves American experience. They would take drugs crime out of the common court system—47 per cent. of drugs issues go to court rather than being dealt with elsewhere by cautions or suspended or deferred sentences. If such cases could be dealt with more imaginatively and effectively, we would make progress.

This is a valuable debate, which I hope that we can have every year. I commend the Leader of the House and his Cabinet Sub-Committee. I hope that we can get the maximum agreement. I am grateful that we almost managed to get through without silly party political games. There are differences of view, but they are less important than the general desire to get the message across. Hindus say that we are created with bodies capable of working without artificial stimulants. The fewer drugs we use, the better.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): The hon. Gentleman finished with two interesting points. Knowing the tortuous business of the hypothecation of funds, I shall be interested in the Government's reaction to the recycling of funds derived from drug crimes.

It would have been all too easy for the cynics to condemn the publication of "Tackling Drugs Together" as mere posturing: the sort of document that many Departments would put their names to, after which precious little would be done. The reverse has been the case. Once again, the Government have pioneered a brave and far-sighted initiative for which they have received minimal recognition and thanks outside the House. I was fascinated by the arguments put forward so coherently by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) for the balanced way in which he endorsed my right hon. Friend's sensible proposals, which are being tackled on a cross-party basis.

In my constituency, the police, acting in close co-operation with the drug action team, could hardly have adopted the Government's policies with greater enthusiasm. Their success has been endorsed and encouraged by visits in the past few weeks by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, as co-ordinator of Government policy, and by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. They have seen at first hand the added value of agencies talking and working together: the police, health authorities, schools, the probation service and the voluntary sector. For once, the whole picture is being seen in the round and the best strategies have been followed.

There have been three major themes: enforcement, education and treatment. Enforcement, as we know, has concentrated on tackling dealing and trafficking. Education has involved parents, teachers and governors and has extended, I am delighted to say, into licensed premises—the pubs and clubs. Treatment has broken away from the old cycle of the criminal system circulating offenders round and round so that counselling and referral to caring authorities happens sooner rather than later.

In the wider context, I suspect that we and our successors will be discussing the best way of tackling the menace of drug abuse for many years to come. The constant need to educate and warn young people of the threats that drugs pose to their health, livelihoods and happiness will never change. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House referred to the youth awareness scheme that he witnessed in Merton.

At this stage of our battle against the increasing trend of drug use, it is profoundly misguided to float the idea of legalisation of some drugs or, to use the current euphemism, decriminalisation. How on earth can the bodies brought together by the Government's efforts send out a clear and coherent message if they are undermined by arguments, beguiling though they may be academically, from certain quarters of Westminster and the media?

Mr. Flynn: The Dutch Government claim in a letter to me that their policies have reduced soft drug use among Dutch people and reduced the number of hard drug addicts. Can the hon. Gentleman give any examples of the policies that he has described resulting in a decrease in drug use?

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: I link the hon. Gentleman's question to the position of the editor of the British Medical Journal, which is not an organ that I would normally criticise. His editorial of 23 December last year is headed, "The War on Drugs: Prohibition is not working; some legislation will help". I suggest that the hon. Gentleman and I discuss this during a health debate, but I put on record that I wholly reject that editorial and all it stands for. I endorse what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland).

Mr. Flynn rose—

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: I shall not give way again yet.

The education of potential consumers and the victims of drugs will never be the whole answer. The production of crops, their processing and distribution of the resultant drugs will continue as long as there are markets anywhere in the world. In the past few months, I have found it increasingly depressing to visit countries that grow coca and poppies, where I have heard about well-meaning, fashionable but flawed schemes of crop substitution. It is all very well to spray vast areas of Pakistan or Peru to kill the crops on which workers on that land depend, usually at subsistence level, and then to try to persuade them to grow other products with the help of subsidies or otherwise. The truth is that the more one asks about the financial viability of those substitute crops, the less firm evidence one gets of any sustained as opposed to short-term success.

I never cease to be amazed at the adaptability of agricultural practices. In many parts of south America, for example, the most likely example of crop substitution—the ultimate irony—is poppies for coca plants. That is paradoxical in the extreme and hardly the intent of the Drug Enforcement Agency and other well-meaning organisations. How very convenient that, as the demand for cocaine decreases in the United States, heroin is now more readily available on its doorstep instead of coming virtually exclusively from Asia.

I visited Lagos a few weeks ago. In the 1980s, the Nigerians were renowned for spearheading and employing high-risk-taking couriers, the so-called swallowers and stuffers. They have now set up their own sophisticated distribution organisations, with increased emphasis on maritime routes rather than air routes. Those new organisations stretch almost from the fields of Bolivia to the streets of Europe. A few years ago, who would have thought that one of the most profitable routes would be from Sao Paulo in Brazil to Moscow, of all places. Consider what opportunities lead from that.

The collapse of the Soviet empire has provided drug traders with enormous opportunities. Lorries can now pass westwards across Europe, unfettered by tiresome border controls and security checks. As if they wished to give them a fair wind, some of our continental partners set up Schengen-land, a licence for easy smuggling, if ever there was one. One of the great issues of the next few years will be ever-increasing economic migration in western Europe. Any parallel movement of drugs could hardly be more unwelcome and dangerous. I trust that the Government will continue to resist with great vigour any lowering of our historic and geographical frontiers, which act as some defence against those unwelcome trends.

I congratulate the Government on all their unsung work in various parts of the world, ranging from international co-operation in security operations in south America to tracking controlled deliveries around the world. That work is aimed at combating the drugs menace. I urge my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to ensure that at the current intergovernmental conference, despite all the distractions and contentious issues of which we are all aware, the fight against drugs is not neglected and is given the prominence that it so badly needs, for the good of all our citizens.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The great heresy of our age and of our generation is the belief that all the problems of boredom, pain, discomfort and grief can be answered by the use of drugs. Humankind has continued for thousands of years without their use, but we have accepted the great heresy implicit in the use of not just the illegal drugs mentioned today, but all drugs.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: I find that a most extraordinary statement. As the hon. Gentleman knows I am a physician and for thousands of years drugs have been used for medicinal purposes. To begin his thesis with such a statement is a rather bad start to his speech.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Gentleman speaks for Upjohn, the pharmaceutical company, which provides part of his income, as he has rightly declared.

Let me cite the example of a drug that has been used for 5,000 years, a drug that was used by the people who built the pyramids. They discovered, by experiment, that it helped their eye problems. It has only been in the past 30 years that scientists have discovered that that drug in its natural form—not in its chemical form—reduces the pressure on the inner eye and thus gives great relief to the sufferers of glaucoma. That drug is cannabis and yet its use is forbidden to those who suffer not just from glaucoma but from multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy and the nausea associated with chemotherapy. The House has decided that that should be so.

During our previous debate on this subject, I brought with me to the House three such notorious criminals. One was Carol Howard, who gave cannabis to her daughter Sara. I should stress that that is spelt without an "h"—the Welsh way—because her mother was rather upset to see the anglicised version in Hansard. Sara, aged 28, was dying from a rare form of cancer and the only drug that gave her any relief from the nausea caused by chemotherapy was cannabis. I accept that there were plenty of other drugs available on the national health service, but they turned her into a zombie, whereas cannabis allowed her to express her thoughts freely in her dying days. Her mother rightly gave that drug to her, as any of us would have done, but she was exposed and could have been thrown into gaol and fined £2,500.

One of the other criminals was a lady suffering from multiple sclerosis who found that the only relief for her terrible problems came from cannabis. The other lady was in her 60s and suffering from cerebral palsy. She finds that cannabis gives her great relief. She grows it in her garage and keeps her spliffs in a silver cigarette box near to a picture of Queen Victoria, who used cannabis every month of her adult life to ease her menstrual cramps.

We are now in the silly position of telling young people that there are two sorts of drugs. There are those that are bad, wicked and do a great deal of harm, and others that are somehow acceptable and legal, although harmful. That is not true. We have opened a great gulf between our generation and young people. There is as much truth in what we are telling them about drugs as in the myths that we and previous generations were told about masturbation and blindness, and stories about the tooth fairy and Father Christmas. We are lying to young people and we are not doing any good in reducing the amount of drugs that they take.

I speak as a chemist, and the only drug that I take is a glass of wine or a pint of beer. All hon. Members know that I am a lifelong sufferer from arthritis, but I have not used any medicinal drug for 25 years. I hope to end my days without using any such drugs because, as my own Member of Parliament, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has said, we take far too many of them.

What we have said about Ecstasy is misleading and must be corrected. We should know the truth about it. Ecstasy deaths are a peculiarly British problem. There may have been isolated deaths in other countries, but no other country has witnessed as many deaths as we have. If we wish to understand why Ecstasy deaths occur, we should look at the results of post-mortems. I advise any young person to steer clear of Ecstasy and never to use it. It marinates the brain in serotonin and it destroys receptors in the brain for a long period, although they will be corrected. If people use it, they are carrying out a dangerous experiment with their brain.

A month ago, I spoke to an audience of some 500 young people in London and I said those very things. Of that audience, 98 per cent. put up their hands and said that they had used Ecstasy. They will continue that because of the culture behind it and the fact that they like the companionship in the use of Ecstasy, which many people have spoken about movingly.

What is the truth about Ecstasy's dangers? We do not know the long-term danger. It is a chemical drug that has been around only for a short time in our experience, but deaths have occurred for two reasons. The first deaths occurred because of over-heating. The post-mortem results were the same as post-mortem results on death by heat stroke. There was damage to the liver and so on.

The drug also destroys the body's natural defence mechanisms. People do not worry about the heat. They behave in repetitive ways and, because of that, they ignore the normal signals. More recent deaths, however, have happened because of water, as has been mentioned in the debate. Sadly, the deaths occurred after advice that I would give my own children. I have two teenagers, who do not take drugs. I know that because it is not part of their peer group. Other people in the town do and I give them the same advice. If their child had a problem with Ecstasy, all parents would give him or her water.

Sadly, children have been killed by water because Ecstasy prevents the kidneys from working in the normal way, discharging excess water from the body. If they are not dancing in a hot place or if they are not sweating, they do not lose the water. If they take too much water, however, the brain swells and they die. Tragically, that has happened in a number of recent cases.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman agree—I assume that he does—that one of the ways in which we can have the least adverse short-term effects for people who go to clubs and who might be tempted to get into the habit of using drugs is to have a licensing system for clubs that requires them to have proper ventilation and water supply, as some local authorities have begun to do?

Mr. Flynn: We must accept that. That is my theme: harm reduction. We are fooling ourselves if any of us believe that we will stop illegal or legal drug use. The best that we can achieve, as politicians, is to ensure the least harmful results from drugs. There should be chill-out rooms. People should not take the drug alone. They should take water, but no more than a pint an hour.

We all feel the same about the case over which there was so much publicity and we all want to say to that family how much we sympathise with them and want to give them a hug. There is no worse bereavement than the untimely death of a young healthy child. That grief will live with the families for ever. It is not, however, the only death involved. That death would have been avoidable, with proper, timely medical advice and if people realised the danger of taking water.

I quoted earlier the figure of 54 deaths in which Ecstasy was mentioned as a possible cause. One was a recent death involving a young girl—also the daughter of a policeman—who took one and a half Ecstasy tablets and between 20 to 30 co-proxamol tablets, which would have killed her four times over. She also took an unknown quantity of alcohol.

There is no question that that girl died from the co-proxamol tablets. She took three times the lethal dose. The "Today" programme said that the death was due to Ecstasy, which was unlikely. The case would be included in the 54 deaths.

Thirty-four people have died from Ecstasy use alone. There has been only one death in Holland. In most countries there have been no deaths. This is a particularly British problem because of the way in which the rave culture has developed in overheated rooms without ventilation or chill-out areas. We will not reduce those deaths by telling people not to take Ecstasy. They will not listen to us. What we say to them is distorted. We will do it by asking them to take proper precautions. Nor will they take any notice of what we are saying about many other drugs.

The best thing we can say about prisons today is that we have one gaol out of the hundred plus in this country which is almost drug free. We can have a programme that achieves five drug-free prisons. Gaols are closed communities with great walls outside and with people being searched on their way in and every gaol in Britain is awash with illegal drug use. It is endemic in almost every prison. Prisoners can choose which drugs to have. They have a range to pick from. If we fail to control drug use in prisons, how on earth can we succeed in reducing it or controlling it in clubs and schools?

As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said, driving the use of drugs is not the fact that it is enjoyable or wicked, but profit. The black market is making money out of drugs. All the way from the fields in Colombia to the school gate, someone gets a cut in the pyramid selling of drugs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North said, market forces are behind it. Our aim should be to collapse the drug black market, to accept that drug use is inevitable, and to find out how best to control it.

I have never advocated decriminalising any drugs except cannabis for medical use, but, at the end of the royal commission, we will see not paradise on earth or a drug-free Britain, drugs distributed by doctors in a proper way or by businesses that can be vigorously controlled. It is not a perfect system. The way in which alcohol is distributed is far from perfect. We should have more limits on the sale of alcohol, but we will not stop drugs getting into the hands of people who are most affected by them.

There are two vulnerable groups. I heard a Minister say that, if we decriminalise drugs, school children can get hold of them. Where is he living? Hardly one school child in this country cannot get hold of drugs. If it happens under a different regime and a licensed seller of drugs was found to be giving a drug to children or to another vulnerable group—such as schizophrenics or people suffering from mental illness—he would lose his licence. There is a good chance of reducing harm under that system.

The Leader of the House gave a selective quote about Holland, but the view of the Dutch Government is different. The view of a right-wing think tank published by the Institute of Economic Affairs was different. It said that the Dutch experience had resulted in two important changes. One was the reduction in the use of soft drugs, cannabis and Ecstasy among young people, principally because it becomes boring and it is not glamorous, sexy, thrilling or illegal. That is what happens when it becomes a legal activity. The other change was to separate young people who were taking soft drugs from the hard drug market.

In this country, anyone who has to use drugs will have to cross the boundary of legality into the world of illegality. They will be exposed not just to soft drug, but hard drug pushers. That is where the danger lies.

Mr. Spring: Let me tell the hon. Gentleman just a bit more about the place that he so greatly admires—Holland. The net result is that cannabis is infinitely stronger than 20 or 30 years ago. There are now variants of cannabis that cause hallucinations and psychiatric disorders. It is all produced in Amsterdam, which, as a result of this absurd liberal policy, is the place for exporting problems throughout Europe. It is a disgrace.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Gentleman is wrong, but I will not take him up on the details of where cannabis is produced. There is skunk cannabis now, which is much more potent than the other types. It does produce hallucinations. [Interruption.] Let us consider the evidence. I am not suggesting that anyone should take cannabis. People should avoid it, as they should avoid all drugs—that is my constant theme—but let us consider the relative harm that it does.

Those people who are using cannabis in Holland now are not using hard drugs. The average age of the hard drug user has increased to the late twenties from the early twenties.

Mr. Spring indicated dissent.

Mr. Flynn: Well, consider the decisions of the Dutch Government. Ask the Dutch embassy to provide information; it is happy to do so. It says passionately that the policy has worked for Holland, but of course it is not perfect. The problem is that Holland, acting on its own, is attracting abusers of drugs from all countries.

Let us put this in context. How many people does cannabis kill? Will the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) tell me how many people have died from the use of skunk cannabis? The figure is easy to remember—zero. No one has been poisoned by cannabis abuse. It is almost impossible to be. It is a substance that has been used for 3,000 years at least, it is less poisonous than aspirin, and it leaves people in a benign state. I could give the figures for the other drugs. Heroin kills—

Mr. Spring: I dispute entirely what the hon. Gentleman is saying, because I have spoken to drugs professionals and their emphatic view is that those young people who may be prone to schizophrenia or similar mental disorders, who take a strong cannabis-like drug like skunk, can be driven into more extreme cases of mental disorder and possible suicide.

Mr. Flynn: I do not dispute that. I am only giving the figures that the Government provide. Of course all drugs are harmful. The number of people per year killed by cannabis is zero; by Ecstasy, seven; and by heroin, 100. The Government figure for paracetamol is 200; interestingly, the latest Library figure is 580. For all medicinal drugs, the figure is 2,500; for alcohol, up to 40,000; and for cigarettes, 100,000.

I know that those figures are crude because different numbers take each drug, but they show us the hypocrisy behind what we are saying. When we say to young people, "You have this drug that binds you together as a community in your rave culture," and we preach to them, as was said this morning from the Front Bench, that our message is that drug use is bad, and we say it possibly from one of the 15 bars in the House, with a cigarette in one hand, a glass of whisky in the other and a couple of paracetamol in our pocket for our headaches, it is right that they turn to us and say, "Hypocrite!" All drug use is bad—it is all damaging—but because, as a generation, we have accepted certain drugs of abuse ourselves, our view of what is happening with young people becomes distorted.

We have got ourselves into a hopeless mess with the prison system. Two defendants from Gwent faced court charges and were found guilty, for the second and third time, of very serious offences and their barristers, in different courts, on different days, with different defendants, eight months apart, put up the defence, "This person cannot be sent to gaol because, if he is, he might fall into the habits that he did last time of becoming a heroin addict." In both cases, the courts decided that that person should not go to gaol, and they got away with lighter sentences in the community.

What an extraordinary indictment it is that drug abusers get away without gaol sentences because we cannot control drug use in prisons. The answer that was given from the Front Bench this morning is not the answer. There is a great deal of tolerance of cannabis use in prisons, and the reason is that when people are on the "wacky baccy" they are quiet, passive and easy to handle. If they are on alcohol, they are violent and abusive.

A case that made me angry recently was that of three soldiers who had served heroically in Bosnia as part of a human shield and had been decorated for it. They were in Chepstow, in Gwent, when a search was made and some cannabis was discovered, and they were dismissed from the Army. I asked some questions about how the Army had reacted to these cases and how many soldiers had been thrown out as a result of drug abuse cases. Extraordinarily, in one year, 458 people serving in the three armed forces were dismissed for involvement with drugs, mostly soft drugs. How many were dismissed for alcohol use? The figure was 13 in that period.

We all know the reality of service life. I know the reality of my father's experience because he served in the—

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman somewhat goaded me into asking him this question when he referred to soldiers being dismissed for taking drugs. Does not he understand that, in the armed forces, one must have an utterly disciplined force or people would be incapable of carrying out their duties? Surely he is not saying that he would tolerate serving soldiers going out on their duties high on drugs?

Mr. Flynn: I would say that it is a disciplined force and that the persons involved deserve to be disciplined. They deserve the slap across the knuckles; they deserve whatever punishment may be meted out. I doubt whether they deserve exactly the same sentence from the Army as the three soldiers who beat to death a defenceless Danish girl with a spade in Cyprus.

Lady Olga Maitland: There is no parallel between the Cyprus sentences and drugs.

Mr. Flynn: That was what the Army's sentence was. There were other sentences available.

Let us reflect on that case. Those three soldiers had been drinking wine or beer that night. The result was that they ended up lecherous and violent and attacked that poor girl and took her life from her. Let us put it another way. If they had been among the three soldiers in my constituency who had been on cannabis, they would have been, not in a violent or lecherous mood, but in a benign, passive mood as many of the prisoners are in this country, and that girl's life would have been spared because they would not have been in that mood. That is a case that one can contemplate about the way in which the Army treats people.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) talks about a disciplined force. I remember my father telling me vivid stories about the first world war, where only two things were in supply in special abundance—alcohol and cigarettes. The troops were short of food of all types, but they had an infinite amount of alcohol and cigarettes. So many of those soldiers who came back suffered from alcohol problems all their life, including an uncle of mine, and my father died of lung cancer at the age of 43, not coincidentally.

Our society is now soft on the major problems that those drugs cause. We have a Minister who is not present at the moment. He complained because I intervened on him so often, but I anticipated that he might well not be here for much of my speech, because there are people in the House, of all parties, who use this awful drug called cigarettes. I speak with some sympathy, as an ex-addict, and I use the term rightly because nicotine is the most addictive of all drugs.

Dr. Goodson–Wickes indicated dissent.

Mr. Flynn: I will refer the hon. Gentleman to a table published in The Guardian some months ago and the British Medical Journal articles, which show that tobacco is the most addictive drug.

Let us consider the harm done by the pharmaceutical drugs. I wonder whether the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson–Wickes) read New Scientist three weeks ago, which gave an account of the causes of a simple problem that most people have—headaches. It suggested that the main cause of headaches was painkillers taken to cure headaches. That is an entirely respectable scientific opinion—that we are conditioned to take drugs in large quantities to great excess.

I rejoiced yesterday when Asda Group plc was told that its campaign to make some drugs, principally paracetamol, available at cut price in its supermarkets had been frustrated because the Independent Television Commission had decided to forbid its advertisement being shown on television. There are murmurs coming from Conservative Members. Let us consider paracetamol and the minimum accepted number of deaths—250 a year. It is normally young girls between the ages of 15 and 18 who die of that drug, often at a time in their lives when they have taken two or three tablets as a pain killer. The pain does not go away, so they take two or three more; the pain still does not go away, so they take a handful and irreversible damage is done.

In Pontefract a group of people involved in health decided to send a 12-year-old girl to buy a specific drug. It asked her to buy 50 tablets. She visited, not just chemists, but supermarkets and garages. She had no difficulty buying 50 tablets—a fatal dose that would have been enough to kill her three or four times over—but had difficulty in not buying 100 because several of the outlets tried to persuade her to buy 100.

So many drugs are killers and are now freely available. If one believes the Government, paracetamol kills twice as many people every year as heroin, if one believes the Library, it kills about six times as many people. I have long advocated that that medicinal drug should be available only on prescription. The Government will not adopt that policy and, as recently as one month ago, they refused to do so again. That illustrates the confusion about drugs that exists in the House.

Why does not prohibition work? It never has worked. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have made speeches that were full of the schemes, including education schemes, and activities that exist and that they want to introduce. I do not question their sincerity today and their feeling that they want to take the right action. I asked the hon. Member for Wimbledon, but he failed to answer, to tell me of occasions when such schemes had worked and had led to a reduction in drug use. There are plenty of activities and schemes.

I had similar correspondence with the Minister of State for Education and Employment. He said that the answer lay in education. I asked him to supply me with details of any education on illegal drugs anywhere in the world that had ever resulted in a reduction in drug use.

Mr. Spring: The hon. Gentleman is making an extraordinary point. If people prevent themselves from falling ill through eating sensibly or not drinking excessively, there is no way in which one can determine the number of heart attacks or strokes that would otherwise have occurred—that is the nature of prevention.

Canada has been operating a national strategy for a number of years. The Canadians feel that, during that time, as a result of the emphasis that they have placed on prevention, they have been able demonstrably to measure the decrease in the consumption of illegal drugs.

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Gentleman's evidence is pretty weak. He says that the Canadians believe that they can demonstrably measure. I do not know those figures, but I have challenged the Government to produce figures and they have not produced any in a long time.

I can provide examples—the major example involves what occurred in America in the 1950s—of drug education causing harm. In the 1950s the Americans decided to confine illegal drug abuse to major cities. Their answer was to send teams of anti-drug campaigners out into the plains; those teams consisted of mostly long-haired, ex-drug users with guitars. They went round the schools in America singing attractive songs about not taking drugs. The young people saw those ex-drug users as role models—as people who had gone through the system and come out the other side. As a result, the young people found that they had a way of challenging their parents' generation and a means of expressing their wish to flirt with risk—as all young people do. Drug misuse by those young people followed the campaign as surely as night follows day.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have said that we have wonderful campaigns—I agree that they are far better than imprisonment. But cannot the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds see that what is mocking today's speeches—as it mocked last year's debate on the subject and will mock next year's—is the fact that drug use is greater now than it has ever been. It was greater last year than the year before that and it will be even greater next year. Everything that we do does not work—the British Medical Journal is absolutely right: prohibition is not working.

I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) about cigarettes. We all know the evils of cigarettes—anyone who has smoked cigarettes knows, from the effect on their bodies, what that does to them. The statistics show that 100,000 people a year die from cigarettes. We know the problems caused by alcohol—3 per cent. of cancers are caused by alcohol. We can consider the differences between the effects of different activities: seven deaths a year are caused by Ecstasy; there are eight deaths from alcohol every two hours, but we carry on using it and we try to control it. If my hon. Friend believes in prohibition—if he thinks that it is working and it is the way to tackle all drug use—why not prohibit cigarettes? We all know what would happen. There would be a repeat of what happened in America: when alcohol was prohibited for 13 years, the statistics showed reductions in consumption in the early stages because alcohol was not available, but within a short time, there were 20,000 speakeasies in Chicago alone. The result was increased drunkenness, increased amounts of adulterated, poisonous alcohol, increased deaths from alcohol and increased problems because of its unknown strength and quality. That is precisely the current position with illegal drugs.

Mr. Fabricant: What is the hon. Gentleman arguing? Is he saying that the condition of all drugs, both illegal and legal, is the same? He is saying, is he not, that tobacco smoking is just as dangerous as the use of other drugs—I agree with him on that. Is he saying that, as he believes that there is no effective way of stopping people taking drugs and that prohibition of drugs does not work, he would legalise all drugs? Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Flynn: I am not saying that. I am saying—as I have always said, although some people claim that I have asked for the legalisation of drugs—that I want a royal commission. To broaden the debate, may I say that by the time that it comes into force it will be a people's commission. As things are at the moment, public opinion is so steeped in prejudice and ignorance on the subject that that is not a practical proposition. I am asking for us to return to the position that we were in in 1971, when cannabis was prescribed for the use of certain illnesses—that is the sort of legalisation for which I am asking.

I believe that we will come to a decision in the future—probably early in the next century, when we will have a clear view of the dangers of all drugs and will put them into some sort of hierarchy of danger. We will limit their sales and control their use in order to reduce their harm.

We have problems now with prohibition. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds gave us part of the case for prohibition. I point out to him that there is one doctor in this country who has been prescribing heroin. He did not treat heroin addicts with methadone which—this may surprise the hon. Gentleman—has killed more people than heroin; the medicine is worse than the problem itself. He treated them by prescribing heroin. His patients could get heroin from the health service immediately, which decriminalised them. They did not have to steal £100 to £300 a week to feed the habit, so crime went down. They did not feel that crime was the only answer. Many of the 200 to 300 people in that doctor's care rehabilitated themselves because they were not under pressure as they had been before. They knew where the drug was coming from and many of them went back to work.

Unfortunately, the doctor's clinic has now been closed and the patients have gone back to prostitution and theft. They have had to go back on the streets to buy heroin of uncertain quality and strength. Sixteen of them are now dead. Those are the two possibilities. Either heroin is obtainable through a black market system, which is deadly and increases crime and death, or it is available through a system of regulation in which the strength and purity of the product can be known and in which people can live relatively normal lives and have a real chance of rehabilitation.

Hon. Members on both sides are saying that they believe in prohibition. My argument is that prohibition does not work—[Interruption.] Is the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds trying to intervene?

Mr. Spring: I am waiting for the hon. Gentleman to finish.

Mr. Flynn: I am surprised that no one wants to intervene on this point. I can tell the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds, who seems to be angry about the matter, that I am concluding the introduction to my remarks. I hoped that the Leader of the House would return. I am sure that he has gone to have a quick fix from one of his cigarettes; he is a smoker. I say that with some—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should see that tobacco use is an addiction, that nicotine is a drug and that it is the most deadly one we have to face. Not only do we throw people into gaol for using cannabis, which is a relatively harmless drug, but we spend £100 million trying to persuade people to use tobacco.

Conservative Members may well recall that during the election campaign, Imperial Tobacco gave poster sites to the Conservative party. The company told me in a letter that it did that because the Conservative party was the only one that did not intend to impose a ban on tobacco advertising. The Conservative party colludes with the drug pushers of nicotine while it condemns others.

A drug worker in Cardiff told me recently, pointing to the absurdity of the present situation, that a father came with some concern to the drug abuse clinic. He complained that his young son was spending his Saturday nights reading poetry and smoking a cannabis joint. His father wanted him to go out every Saturday night, as he did, and to do the macho thing of drinking 15 pints. There is a great deal of difference between those alternatives.

In our previous debate, the Under-Secretary of State for Health said that one of the derivatives of cannabis should be made available as a medicine. Naboline and Dronabinol are now available; they are very similar. The path that we are going down is dangerous. We know that cannabis is a highly complex substance consisting of at least 65 main elements. We do not know what the reactions between those elements are and it may be that one derivative neutralises another. It is dangerous to go down the path of extracting chemical products rather than using a natural substance that has been around for a long time.

I appeal to the Minister to look again at all the people who are now breaking the law for themselves or for their relatives because taking cannabis is the only way in which they can find relief from painful illnesses. We know that the reason for opposition to cannabis is not entirely medical. We know that the Government and the official Opposition realise that there are great harvests of votes to be gained from quarrying the great cliffs of ignorance and prejudice in society, although not among young people. I am afraid that that is the view of both sides.

Mr. George Howarth: I do not think that those remarks are worthy of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Flynn: I refer my hon. Friend to what happened some time ago in a by-election. One candidate shared my views. He wanted an intelligent debate on cannabis and all other drug use and wanted a royal commission to consider practical methods of harm reduction. Unfortunately, my party denounced that person and presented our candidate differently. The decision of the electorate meant that the Liberal Democrat candidate was elected after he had been found in possession of an intelligent idea and the Labour candidate was rejected for implausible sanctity on the subject of drugs.

The House, made up as it is of politicians of a certain generation, should be warned that a whole electorate of young people outside have far more experience than any of us have of the use of recreational drugs of choice. Those young people have become alienated from the political process. They realise that what we say about drugs is not true and when they stop believing us on that subject, they stop believing us on many others.

I share all the genuine and sincere anxiety that has been expressed in the House about the thousands of deaths that occur every year as a result of drug misuse. Our policies are not rational at the moment. We must examine successful cases and we must not continue to repeat the failures of the past. Wars on drugs have gone on all this century in every country. Virtually none of them has produced a reduction in drugs. For goodness sake, let us have an open, rational debate about reducing the harm caused by all drugs, legal and illegal.

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): All those who heard the speech by my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council will have been impressed by the extraordinary way in which he has taken on his brief and moved forward the agenda for tackling drug abuse in this country. He has done so with characteristic modesty and self-effacement, but I salute him for his accomplishments today on behalf of all of those who have taken an interest in the subject. The subject has also been taken on by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his approach has worked extremely well in moving forward the agenda.

I also wish to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) because he sought to highlight the real dangers of drugs misuse for many years before it became such a central focus of interest in Parliament, through the central drugs co-ordination unit. I salute him for his unsung work over the years.

My right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council referred to the fact that a real attempt is being made throughout the United Kingdom to tackle the growing, difficult and intractable problem of drugs misuse. My right hon. Friend might be interested to learn that the Northern Ireland Select Committee is examining the question of drugs misuse in the Province, which has become an especial problem, not only because of the significant drug problems in Dublin, but because of the terrorists' activities and their desire to make money.

We know that a structure has been put in place, and I wish, by way of example, to refer to our experience in Suffolk and to examine whether the White Paper has had the intended impact in local communities. How, for example, are the drug action teams in the various parts of England working in practice?

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) made some interesting and salient observations. I may not have made myself clear earlier, but I am strongly opposed to any kind of decriminalisation. It is sad, however, that the hon. Gentleman's salient comments were not heard by more of his colleagues. It is regrettable that, apart from the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), no other Labour Members of Parliament are present in the Chamber, especially as we are debating what is probably the most crucial social problem of our time.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) talked about the prevalence of drug use. The use of cannabis was mentioned in the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology report, which was released in May. It stated:

"Cannabis is more likely to be used frequently, with 9 per cent. of all cannabis users reporting daily use, and 14 per cent. taking it several times a week."

The health implications, particularly for cancer, are alarming. It continued:

"With Ecstasy, LSD and amphetamines users, very few take these drugs daily, but 20 per cent. take them more than monthly."

That is an alarming statistic. The report continued:

"Of those who have tried cannabis, 1 in 10 develop some form of psychological dependence syndrome."

This is not some sort of safe drug. It continued:

"Significant numbers are reporting experience with more than one illegal drug".

It is not true that there is not some sort of a changeover between different kinds of drugs.

Mr. Flynn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Spring: No, not at this stage—I shall give way later. Despite some of the sensible observations of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, I thought that there was a bit of parliamentary snake oil activity on his part. We know that the Liberal Democrats effectively called for the decriminalisation of cannabis at their 1994 conference. They came out with this fudge—they did not know what to do, so they talked about a royal commission. It has now moved along because of the effect of the national strategy and it is now supposedly a more all-encompassing agency. It is a fudge, and all hon. Members recognise it for what it is.

I refer to criminality. The Department of Health task force review on services to drug misusers pointed out that the 1,110 drug misusers included in the national treatment outcome research study committed 70,000 crimes, costing victims £34 million, in the two years before they had treatment—that is five crimes per person per week. We have heard that something like 70 per cent. of youth crime is directly or indirectly linked to drugs.

Even if we put aside the health and moral issues surrounding drugs, we can see that their impact on society includes attacks on people and an upsurge in burglary. A free national helpline was set up and it received 192,755 calls in its first year—that underlines the concern of parents and others in the community about drugs.

My personal odyssey in learning about drugs misuse started in my constituency only a few months after I became a Member of Parliament. I was approached by the general practitioners in Newmarket who were concerned about drugs misuse, particularly that of amphetamines. They felt that the key elements of the local community were not working together effectively—they included the police, social services, the probation service, general practitioners and others. They felt that I, as a Member of Parliament, could play some sort of role.

I created a drugs task force in Newmarket. What has happened since the evolution of the drugs task force is interesting. We have sought to prevent drugs misuse in part by taking on three youth outreach workers who go into the town at night to talk to young people about any subject, including their problems. I have accompanied those outreach workers, who are an impressive group of people. They are extremely approachable.

To answer the point raised by the hon. Member for Newport, West, of course we cannot measure the effect in that small community of having those three youth outreach workers in terms of preventing people from taking drugs, but it certainly seems to be a sensible way of handling the problem. All the feedback that I have heard from the outreach workers suggests that young people with real problems find them approachable and can talk to them. As a result, some may have decided not to get involved in drugs.

Sadly, however, drugs misuse continues to grow. Despite some important and helpful moves in the Newmarket community, there has been a growing incidence of heroin addiction. A similar task force has been set up in the main town in my constituency, Bury St. Edmunds. How we can imaginatively address the interests of young people in trying to lead their lives without experimenting with drugs is a source of great concern. We have decided to have a drugs awareness week, including a drugs-free rave. Having written to the local branches of Tesco and Marks and Spencer, I would like to thank them for the money that they have donated to enable us to go ahead with our drugs awareness week. I hope and believe that it will be successful.

The two drugs task forces, assisted by the two district councils, jointly employ a substance misuse training officer who talks to parents, teachers, clubs and societies about the dangers of drugs, the warning signs and all the help that is increasingly available because of the strategy that my right hon. Friend unveiled last year.

I believe that the local community effort in my constituency is strong. Of course it is at the heart of our national strategy—working through local communities and adapting to their needs.

As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said, the 105th drug action team reported on 31 December and each plan of action has been adjusted to different circumstances. In my constituency, under the leadership of the Suffolk health authority and its chairman, Joanna Spicer, we now have a manager to examine drugs-related issues and the overall commitment for the county of Suffolk. He came from East Sussex Drugs Advisory Council in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), which is a great role model for the rest of the country, and we are lucky to have him in place. He discovered that the three service agencies in the county were barely talking to each other.

[Mr. Spring]

There was no hostility, but because they were in different geographical locations, they were not co-operating effectively.

We are trying to make sure that services are co-ordinated and that joint functioning of the strategy works effectively right across the board, so that local arrangements reflect the national strategy. We certainly do not want a glorified national strategy that does not operate at grass-roots level.

What is happening in my area is clearly occurring across the country: existing groups are co-operating for the good of those who are affected by the drugs problem. I am pleased to see that the groups involved in the areas of drugs prevention, rehabilitation and enforcement in Suffolk are working together closely.

Mr. Flynn: Does advice include persuading young people not to drink the high-alcohol cordial products that are now available? How will the hon. Gentleman measure the success of those schemes?

Mr. Spring: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point which was drawn to my attention by the youth outreach workers to whom I referred. I accept that there is a link between alcohol and drugs misuse. I accept also that in many parts of the country alcohol abuse is probably a more significant problem than drug abuse. While not wishing to minimise the dangers of alcohol, I stress that today we are discussing the drugs issue and the horrific impact that drugs can have on people's lives.

If a constabulary decides to conduct an anti-drugs operation and carries out raids on houses or pubs, that may have an effect on the prescribed, legal drug supply. If the supply of illegal drugs dries up, those who were addicts or near addicts may go to national health service organisations to obtain drugs legally. By working with the police, those services will know about police activity in advance and thus be ready to deal with the consequences. That did not occur previously. The drugs strategy is important as it tries to persuade people to work together, under the aegis of drugs action teams, in the areas of prevention, rehabilitation and enforcement.

I stress another important aspect of the strategy and I refer again to my experience in Suffolk. I pay tribute to Robin and Lilias Sheepshanks who founded ADFAM (Suffolk) in 1987. They have worked extremely hard to build up that charity through their commitment to young people. They support drug addicts and their families, they offer drugs and bereavement counselling and provide training and education. Their task has been all the more difficult as they have sought funding largely through donations. I hope that organisations such as that will increasingly come under the umbrella of the overall drugs strategy.

We should never forget that drug users have families. Anguished parents do not know what to do: they often cannot accept that their children take drugs and they then suffer the guilt and the concern that follow that realisation. It is crucial to provide support for those families, and that is what is happening in Suffolk.

Drugs destroy lives. It is absurd to make a distinction, as some would, between so-called "soft" drugs and "hard" drugs. As I said before, powerful variants of cannabis have been produced that can cause hallucinations and lead to psychiatric disorders and suicide. Therefore, it is vital from a health point of view that we prevent young people from taking drugs in the first place. All the evidence—particularly from the United States—points to the fact that, although people may try hard to rehabilitate addicts, the success rate is not high. Therefore, prevention is at the heart of the matter.

I hope that more random testing will take place in the private sector. It is already becoming a feature of life in this country—it is certainly happening in the United States—that employers are unwilling to take people on if they are shown to be taking drugs. Nothing would be a greater incentive to young people leaving university to know that their future careers may be put in jeopardy if a test shows that they are involved in taking drugs. I hope that random testing increasingly becomes part and parcel of the private sector's way of doing things.

What has been set in place is absolutely crucial for the future stability of our society. Drugs have become a real cancer in our midst. We are genuinely seeking a strategy based on local community partnerships, on prevention, rehabilitation and enforcement, working together to find a way through.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary—I know that he has a strong personal commitment to this, as I have heard him speak on the subject, and I know how much he is appreciated by professionals in the area of drugs misuse—for the clear commitment that he is giving to fighting the menace of drugs in our society.

It is good that we had almost a cross-party view on this subject and that we have been able to look at the problem dispassionately a year on. I hope that we shall be able to do this each year in future. I hope that, by all the means at our disposal, we will be able in a few years' time to say that the tide is turning demonstrably. Britain is setting an example that is unique in Europe. I believe that there is no other way forward than the route that we are taking to try to address this problem in our society.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I am pleased that the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) spoke today. Much of his speech was interesting and provided useful grit and argument for our debate, as there is sometimes a danger in these debates that we all agree with each other. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), who spoke for the Opposition, said that he wanted to be consensual. There is a danger that we will drown in a warm bath of schemes, treacle, White Papers and so on and that we will congratulate ourselves, saying that we are doing terribly well. But outside, apparently, we are losing the battle. Last year the police seized a record amount of drugs—55.5 tonnes, including 1 tonne of heroin and 0.5 tonne of Ecstasy. I did not agree with everything that the hon. Gentleman said, but he was right to say what he did.

It is a pity that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) could not be here—I am not making a political speech, as I rather admire her—as she courageously holds a point of view that many people share, in all political parties: the way to solve the problem is to legalise so-called "soft" drugs. Some of the arguments adduced by the hon. Member for Newport, West have been quite interesting in that regard, but I do not agree with him. I listened carefully to what he said, and have read carefully what has been written in favour of legalising soft drugs, but I just do not think that the case for legalising soft drugs has been made. The Holland experience is extremely worrying. We have heard about the tendency towards more dangerous forms of cannabis. The effect that it has on other countries, particularly our own, is highly regrettable. Indeed, it underlines the need for strong border controls, and the danger of a single market, where we surrender our ability to keep out drugs from a country that has such a liberal and dangerous policy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) made the point that a major attraction of so-called soft drugs is their illegal nature. If one legalises them, one simply passes that attraction on to harder drugs and so it goes on.

Mr. Flynn indicated dissent.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but that point must at least be arguable. I am not sure that we can take the risk. I do not think that we should do so.

The analogy with alcohol and cigarettes is not entirely accurate. Alcohol abuse does kill, but one cannot equate spirits with the strongest drugs. The path into hard drug abuse is much more dangerous and, therefore, the hon. Members for Newport, West and for Ladywood and those like them, have not made a case for legalising soft drugs.

Mr. Flynn: I shall give another statistic that I did not give in my speech. In the most recent year for which we have figures, more people were killed by alcohol poisoning—drinking more than three quarters of a pint of whisky—than from taking heroin. The figures were 158 compared with 100. So, alcohol can be equated with such drugs as a poison.

Mr. Leigh: Of course. We all know that people abuse alcohol and kill themselves but virtually everyone in this country drinks alcohol and most people do not kill themselves by doing so. Indeed, the Government tell us that a small amount of alcohol is good for us—21 units a week. That is quite a large amount and I find it incredible, but that is the scientific advice.

I do not accept the arguments that the United States tried to prohibit alcohol in the 1920s and look what it did, that because we prohibit drugs we create a criminal culture, and that the way to solve the problem is to decriminalise drugs. That is an interesting point of view, but the case is not proven and it is too dangerous a path.

Despite all that, we are losing the battle. I represent Lincolnshire, which is not a particularly urban area. The Lincolnshire police tell me that 70 per cent. of children will have been offered drugs by the time that they leave school. I do not know about my hon. Friends and Opposition Members, but I was never offered drugs while I was at school and I do not remember my friends being offered them. I see my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) and the hon. Member for Knowsley, North shaking their heads—I do not think that they were offered drugs at school.

When my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House introduced the debate, he said that it was a matter for congratulation that 50 per cent. of children turned down the opportunity. If 50 per cent. turn it down, 50 per cent. are taking it and that should be deeply disturbing to us. We should be asking ourselves what on earth we are going to do. Indeed, is there anything that we can do? In Lincolnshire—a rural area—there were 425 arrests in 1991, but that had risen to nearly 1,200 last year. There was a matching rise for drug seizures—from 350 in 1991, to 1,400 last year. The problem is reaching out from the major towns to all the smaller towns and villages. What are we going to do about it?

I congratulate the Government on doing all that they can. I have no magic solution. The White Paper, "Tackling Drugs Together", is excellent. I see no alternative but to continue to make all drugs illegal, to apprehend dealers and convict them and to remind people that dealing in hard drugs can attract a maximum life sentence. We must continually increase that level of deterrence, which is what we are doing and what the Government announced in the White Paper, "Protecting the Public". There is now a minimum sentence of seven years for dealing in hard drugs.

Perhaps we should go further and make it clear that anyone convicted of dealing in hard drugs will automatically go to prison. I suspect that the courts ensure that most of them do, but deterrence has an effect. We have heard about the Drug Trafficking Act 1994, which ensures that dealers do not gain from their trade and that is all to the good, but how far are we prepared to go? Can deterrence solve the problem? Clearly it cannot.

Are we prepared to go as far as the Prime Minister of Singapore? It is a pity that he is not in on this debate. He could add a different perspective from that of the hon. Member for Ladywood. He believes that the way to solve the problem is to hang all dealers. Clearly, we are not prepared to do that—there is no way that we will go that far. Has hanging solved the problem in Singapore? I suspect that it may have gone some way to solving it, but it clearly has not dealt with it entirely; nor has it dealt with it in Malaysia or Thailand. I welcome what the Government are trying to do by way of deterrence. I have no better solution, but it will not work on its own.

We have heard a lot about education. We are doing a lot of it in Lincolnshire. There is grant for education support and training funding, which allows training to be given to teachers with responsibility for drug education projects. There is something called DIPSE, drug import primary school education. In Lincolnshire we are taking education into primary schools, so great is the problem. We are teaching children of nine and 10 about it. My children have had police come to their school to tell them about it. We are doing our best on education. None of it seem to make any difference.

Is there a solution? The hon. Member for Newport, West asked the unanswerable question. We are losing the battle. There have always been drugs in society, but why is our society so prone to them? Is our society breaking down? In 19th century China, drugs such as opium were prevalent. Society there was breaking down because of famine, war and invasion, but we do not suffer from those.

I want to take a different approach from that of other hon. Members. I do not think that we can congratulate ourselves and say that by producing a White Paper, increasing sentences or legalising drugs we will solve the problem. We need to ask what is wrong with society. Perhaps we live in a society where too much is available.

[Mr. Leigh]

We live in a supermarket society where all the best food, drink and travel are available to everyone. Every pleasure is available to everyone, especially to young people. They continually ask for more. We live in a me-only society. Writers such as Solzhenitsyn have correctly identified that as a modern disease of the west. He thinks that the west is decadent and, ultimately, self-destructive.

My message is obvious and simple but no one has mentioned it in this debate. No Government, whether Conservative or Labour, can ever solve the problem. Only society can regenerate itself. There is no point in middle-aged politicians lecturing young people about taking drugs. If we attempt to do so, we have the opposite effect to what we intend. They are not interested in us telling them that Ecstasy is dangerous. Part of the fun of it is to fight against us. I do not mean Conservative Members but all hon. Members, who represent the establishment to young people.

We will gradually solve the problem only by encouraging younger role models. In the United States, they have got to grips with the problem, not by having policemen or politicians go round schools, but only by using younger role models strumming their guitars trying to convince kids of the dangers of drugs. One of the most moving and impressive speeches that I have I heard in this building was not made in the Chamber but in the Speaker's quarters at a Christian group meeting a few months ago.

We were addressed by a young man who had gone through everything, including drugs and prison. He had become a Christian and a youth leader and he was trying to convince young people of the dangers of taking drugs. I shall always remember his final words. He was speaking to about 30 Members of Parliament and 30 peers, distinguished people in their own way. He said, "I am not a politician; I do not know anything about politics but I have been at the bottom of the heap, in the mire and the filth. I have been in prison, I have taken the drugs and when it comes to legalising drugs, I say just don't do it." That is my message to the House today.

1.8 pm

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): First, I apologise to the House, as I have apologised to Madam Speaker, to yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker and to the Lord President of the Council for my late arrival. Unfortunately, I was unable to get here until 11.30 am and I beg your indulgence. I should also like to extend that apology to the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), because I missed his speech as well as that of my right hon. Friend.

This is an appropriate time to have a debate on drugs because next Wednesday, 26 June, is United Nations international day against drug abuse and illicit trafficking. In common with other hon. Members, I therefore welcome the debate.

It is also good to hear again this morning the cross-party support for the Government's strategy "Tackling Drugs Together". That strategy sets out national plans for local implementation. I accent local implementation because no plan, programme or propaganda will be successful nationally unless it is in tune with local requirements, which vary between different parts of the country and between country and town.

I welcome in particular the greater emphasis in the strategy document and in the activities of the past year on reducing demand through increased prevention and better treatment. I congratulate the Lord President on his efforts over the years and on the way in which he has provided the catalyst within the Government for all the relevant Departments. I should also like to congratulate him on the work of his central drugs co-ordination unit. I congratulate Sue Street, who ran it so well until just a few months ago, when she went on to greater things—she is now trying to knock some sense and better administration into the nation's fire services. I should also like to include the Under-Secretary of State in my congratulations—he has made his own dramatic contribution.

I should like to comment favourably on and praise the Government for the greater attention paid to health education in schools. I shall return to that, because I believe that it needs some tweaking, but without that effort, we shall never overcome the dire straits in our schools, which were referred to so ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

I congratulate the Government on the lead that they are giving and on the increased co-operation that they have offered in the international forums where drugs are discussed. I must draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to comments that I made in a speech last night, when we were discussing the European Union. I believe that the policy of non-co-operation with the EU, when extended to embrace non-co-operation on such matters as the extension of the powers and abilities of Europol, is mistaken. Britain has given a marvellous lead to Europe, and through it to the rest of the world, in improving international police co-ordination, yet that has been subsumed by a momentary, albeit serious, difficulty concerning beef sales in Europe. We have therefore been unable to press forward with the plans that we have hitherto advocated.

All those programmes and plans will have no effect in our country unless we have better co-ordination of effort and co-operation at a local level. I should like to mention specific projects, in particular my local Sussex drug action teams, which grew from the first drug action team that was established in Brighton by the Home Office. That marvellous initiative has been so successful because it grew out of the work already done by the East Sussex Drugs Advisory Council. To answer the point already made by other hon. Members, I am glad to report that that council has widened its remit to embrace alcohol and has been renamed the Alcohol and Drugs Council for East Sussex. In that context, it is interesting to note that the Welsh strategy for tackling drugs also embraces alcohol. The Government should consider that when taking forward the prison strategy.

At local level in East Sussex and elsewhere, as has been illustrated by hon. Members, there is better co-operation between all agencies, including the police and voluntary organisations. Better information is being supplied through, for instance, in Sussex, the drugs advisory and information service. We have better confidential open lines to the police, through which people can feed information about drug peddling, trafficking, pushing and problems. That is being encouraged by the local press—The Argus in Sussex has done a marvellous job in that regard—and by local commercial activities. I commend Iceland frozen food shops for their work to encourage activities in schools.

I received an interesting letter only yesterday morning from Rosalind Turner, a young lady who has worked in the East Sussex Drugs Advisory Council. She won a Winston Churchill fellowship to study drug education and prevention in Australia. She drew many helpful conclusions from her study and pointed out that the main difference in the approach in schools between the United Kingdom and Australia is that, in Australia, the subject is compulsory in the curriculum as health education; it is not part just of biology. It is only by giving the subject a higher priority in our curriculum that we shall remove ignorance, which causes the problem. We should not lecture young people, but we should better inform them so that they are better able to meet the temptations that come their way.

The London Drug Policy Forum is an initiative of the City of London and has been going for years. It is led by Mr. Peter Rigby, who has done a magnificent job, not only in co-ordinating all the diverse activities of Greater London boroughs, but in leading for Great Britain in the international efforts, under the title "Cities Against Drugs". We should be grateful to him and to the Corporation of London for what they have done, which is not well known outside the City, but should be better known. I lift my hat in his direction.

Mr. Newton: In my speech, I did not attempt to list all the people who deserve much credit in this sector, but I wish to endorse my hon. Friend's remarks about Peter Rigby and his work on behalf of the Corporation of London.

Mr. Rathbone: I am grateful. I shall make certain that Peter Rigby is aware of that endorsement.

I should like to take advantage of the debate to comment on the way in which the "Tackling Drugs Together" strategy operates. Inevitably, my comments are critical, but I hope that they are positive. On the amount of resources that are being made available, in 1993-94, approximately £350 million was spent on enforcement and control, compared with only £61 million on treatment services in the same period. If we are to reduce the pool of drug misusers and so reduce demand for drugs, we must increase the amount of money available for better treatment.

My second point, linked to the first, has often been made by myself and others. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will approach the Treasury once again to persuade it to change its policy on the application of the funds seized from drug dealers under the new rules, and use those funds directly to help the nation's efforts to tackle the problems of drug misuse.

When seizures come about as a result of intelligence or other activities carried out by other nations abroad, those nations almost always impose a requirement that those moneys be applied to the problems of drug misuse. Absurdly, when those seizures come about in this country as a result of our own efforts, the Treasury gets its hands on those moneys and they go into the pool of general taxation, and the activities of improving the tackling of drug misuse do not benefit.

Thirdly, I ask, as was asked earlier: how do we better measure the effectiveness of everything that is going on? The effectiveness of the drug treatment programme has been reviewed in the past 18 months by the Department of Health task force, but I know of no plans for similar reviews of the outcomes stemming from education, prevention, enforcement and control. There is one exception: there will be measurements of the effectiveness of compulsory drug testing in prisons, which is an important but minor segment of overall activity.

There are still long treatment waiting lists for drug services. The Department of Health task force reports waiting lists of up to eight weeks, but there is anxiety locally that those waiting times are increasing. I hope that more funds can be made available and more activities put in hand to meet that requirement. Currently, local and health authorities are obliged to ration access to rehabilitation and treatment programmes to a worrying extent.

The Government should devote attention to establishing drug courts, as has been said in this and previous debates. Such courts are enormously successful in the United States. The movement is led by judges themselves. It developed from frustration with the costly and overcrowded prison system and its inability to treat people who entered it for drug misuse. Although not all judges like the drug courts, especially because it has changed the relationship between the judge, the court and the miscreant, so that the judge's role is one of an active participant, it is noticeable that, not only do they reduce the amount of recidivism among the people brought before them, but "For every $1 spent on the Drug Court, $7 is saved in the criminal justice system."

That is not only a social benefit, but a budgetary one.

I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench will bring pressure on the Home Office to institute trials of such courts, which could so easily be included in our magisterial and court system.

Greater emphasis is being placed on the subject in our current health education programmes in schools, but it is not being given high enough priority within the curriculum. Even if the Government decided to give it higher priority, I doubt whether it could be accommodated under the present allocation to the function, which currently works out at about £250 per school. If we are serious about getting to grips with the drugs problem—which starts and sometimes, thank goodness, finishes among young people—we must devote greater funds to dealing with it. As part of that activity, we can do more to promote sports as a drug abuse prevention tool. Sport is important for girls and boys at school: it burns their energy, attracts their enthusiasm, takes up their time and builds team effort. All those factors are important additions to the Government's activities in tackling drug abuse.

As considerable attention has been given to the subject of legalisation—particularly by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), but also by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and some of my hon. Friends—I should mention it. There is, in many corners, a desire to debate the arguments for and against the legalisation of illicit drugs as part and parcel of the international response to the growing health and social problems of drug misuse, illicit trafficking and, particularly, the crime associated with it.

All European Governments, including Holland, and most Governments throughout the world, continue to value prohibition as a cornerstone of their efforts in tackling drug misuse. The deterrent effect of prohibition should not be underestimated. The hon. Member for Newport, West mentioned the Netherlands and the laxer rather than sterner attitude adopted there. The Amsterdam authorities have become increasingly worried about the ready availability of cannabis in their city. They are putting far stricter rules on the coffee houses through which drugs can be obtained and they are tremendously concerned about how their laxer rules on cannabis have turned Amsterdam into a drug centre for the whole of Europe. It has become a place where people go to get not only cannabis, but the far harder, more serious drugs. Those drugs can be contained with treatment among Dutch people in the Netherlands, but visitors from countries such as Great Britain, Germany, France and Belgium return to their countries and carry on their habit. That is extremely worrying to everyone, including the Netherlands Government.

It is felt that legalisation would lead to increased drug misuse, therefore increasing the mental and physical suffering that accompanies it, just as it accompanies the misuse of tobacco and alcohol. I agree with, and endorse, that view. It is felt that the crime and social problems associated with misuse and trafficking will not be eradicated by legalisation, merely legitimised—I endorse that. It is felt that any possible improvements to be gained from legalisation are, at best, ambiguous and that its implementation, in the light of its virtual irreversibility, cannot be justified. I endorse that position and urge the Government to adhere to it.

Government action, political leadership, international co-operation—particularly in relation to criminal intelligence gathering and law enforcement—and improved methods of health education and treatment, are the most positive ways to tackle and overcome the awful problem of drug misuse. I urge the Government to strengthen their endeavours and to bend even greater energies to the problem in the future than they have before—particularly recently. I endorse what they are doing. But unless we do more, more quickly, we shall not solve the problem for future generations, or for this country or the world.

1.29 pm

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I commend the work done by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister whose initiative it was. It has been followed through splendidly by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Much progress has been made, but the fact that there is no reason for any of us to be in the least complacent has emerged clearly in the debate. When we discuss the problem of drugs in this country, we are dealing with a minority, as is so often the case when the House debates social and other problems. After all, it is only a minority of people who seek to exploit other human beings by pushing, trafficking and dealing in drugs. It is still, thank heavens, only a minority of our fellow citizens who use drugs. However, minorities can cause great damage and harm, not only to themselves, but to the body politic. A great deal of time and money is taken up in trying to deal with this appalling problem.

It is clear that the Government are serious about tackling the problem of drugs. In that context, I very much welcome what has been said today by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and by other Conservative Members about their refusal to contemplate for a moment the possibility of legalisation. I also welcome the remarks by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), who said that it was also the Opposition's policy to say a clear and resounding no to any question of legalisation.

The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), who is not here at the moment, talked about the medicinal uses of cannabis. I point out to him that 30 years or so ago, it was a known fact that one of the highest levels of heroin addiction was found among GPs—people who thought that they knew what they were doing and that they could handle a dangerous drug such as heroin, but who found themselves addicted. There is always a siren voice saying, "Yes, we can cope with drugs." In the end, it is nearly always the drugs that master us and not the other way round.

The two main strands in the debate have been the availability of drugs and education, and I shall say a brief word on each. I seek an assurance from the Home Office, which has a role in the matter, that it sends out a strong enough signal at airports and sea ports warning against smuggling drugs into this country. On the last three occasions on which I have returned to this country from abroad by aeroplane to Heathrow, I have walked through the green channel—innocently and rightly, I assure the House—and nobody has been on duty even to give me the look in the eye that is designed to catch out the person who has something to hide. Do we recognise the value of that element of deterrence in persuading rather stupid people not to act as couriers for those who lie behind drug trafficking?

It is absolutely right that the Government have had no truck with the Schengen agreement, which has opened up the borders of a number of our fellow nations in the European Union. I had a lengthy discussion with a Dutch Member of the European Parliament a few weeks ago about the different attitude taken by some of those countries. She said, "We do not bother with border controls. If we have any reason to think that somebody may be about to misbehave, we can always stop them on the ring road at Antwerp." That was said in the context of terrorism rather than drugs, but the same point applies. We do not do it like that. No one would thank the House for suggesting that we should stop people on the M25 because we suspected them of being terrorists or drug smugglers. We stop them at the border. My question is whether the determination that we have shown in resisting Schengen is reflected by the determination with which we physically police our borders at airports and sea ports.

Much has been said already today about reducing the demand for drugs, but the avenues of approach to drug taking are still in place, especially for young people and children. Alcohol is still available and cigarettes are still all too easily available, as are solvents and glue. We all know that those are the avenues of approach to more dangerous drugs as children get older. I do not belong to that group of people who believe in an inevitable link between soft and hard drugs, but it is likely that those who live in a culture in which one form or another of abuse is common will be the targets for those who seek to push the hard drugs from which the real money is to be made. The only way to prevent dangerous hard drugs from being freely in use in this country is to reduce steadily and inevitably the availability of those other substances that may create the urge to experiment or to raise the level of enjoyment that some people find in drugs.

We all know that children may start on cigarettes or alcohol as form of protest—their parents warn them but they do it anyway—or as a means of conformity, because everybody else in their peer group does it and they feel left out if they do not join in. We are dealing with those two aspects of human nature—the desire to rebel or to conform—and most of us, most of the time, will do one or the other. Human nature is such that we will never remove the possibility of drug taking at some level in our society.

We have a serious drugs problem in 1996, not because human nature has changed dramatically or because society has broken down or because more people are unemployed and have nothing to do, but because there are more, easily available, drugs in this country. As long as that remains the case, we will have a drugs problem. Education is fine as far as it goes and I am not suggesting that we should discontinue what we are doing, but only when we can suppress the availability of drugs, of all kinds, to minimum levels will we crack the problem. The original temptation took place in the garden of Eden. It happened to be only an apple, but we all know the consequences. As long as human nature remains the same, and I think it will, temptation will lead people into trouble.

I shall say a quick word about my constituency. In Swindon we have an excellent branch of Parents against Drugs, which brings the real problems that the community still has with drugs to the attention of law enforcement organisations, people such as myself and the local council. I pay tribute to the local organisation Druglink, and its leader Andy Malinowski, for the work that it does with limited resources, much of which it has to find through its own hard work when it could be concentrating on the job for which it was originally set up. I hope that the lottery will produce more resources for small organisations and charities such as Druglink, which do excellent work.

Parents in my constituency draw to my attention the fact that drug pushers are still active at school gates, in shopping centres and in nightclubs in Swindon. The local police do their best and I pay tribute to the work that they do, but they are hamstrung by the need to get evidence to obtain convictions. It is not easy for them or for the courts—and the problem continues.

I support the plea of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) to anyone who might be listening: never consider the possibility of legalisation. I have never taken the kinds of drugs that have been the topic of the debate. I saw the film "Trainspotting" a few weeks ago—if hon. Members have not seen it, they should force themselves to have a look. Some people have suggested that it glorifies drug taking; it does nothing of the sort—it shows very clearly how life can be destroyed, not just literally but in terms of any quality of life, by taking drugs.

I could go on to say something about alcohol and tobacco—the hon. Member for Newport, West led us in that direction. I believe that alcohol is damaging to people, to families and to communities. I regard it as the basis of much crime and of much anti-social behaviour. We should be tougher on people drinking in public places. The fact that football hooligans drink in pubs on their way to matches continues to depress us, as the evidence at a court hearing yesterday clearly demonstrated.

Smoking is a form of anti-social behaviour. It generates selfishness and litter in public places. Even with the "Health of the Nation" targets, which we are making good progress towards, it remains a serious problem. I could have said a great deal more about those two issues, but I wish to give my hon. Friends an opportunity to participate in the debate.

In summary, we still have a great deal to do to crack the problem of drugs. We are heading in the right direction. With commitment on all sides—which has been evidenced in the debate—we may, in time, create a situation in this country where drugs are so difficult to get hold of that the problem is reduced.

1.40 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I apologise to hon. Members for not being present in the House for the whole of the debate, and I will have to leave shortly after my speech to go to my constituency—I believe that that is the nature of Friday debates. I praise the speech of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth). He made an extremely able speech from the Labour party Front Bench, which was particularly difficult because only one Back-Bench Member is behind him, and he does not necessarily agree with what he said. I thought that he made a sensible analysis.

The way in which the Government and Labour Front Bench speeches meshed together does not mean that we are using empty words, because this is a problem that we cannot cope with. I think that it indicates a sensible analysis and close examination of the problem. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North spoke about his experiences as a Front-Bench spokesman visiting prisons. The problems experienced in his constituency are mirrored in mine—even though it is a different type of constituency. People who are listening to the debate should not think that the Front Benches are agreeing because there is nothing else that they can do—they are agreeing because that is where their analysis brings them to.

Much has been said about the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short). I do not criticise her view—she is entitled to it—although I fundamentally disagree with it. I think that she is wrong when she suggests that everyone would take her view if they had the guts to say so. The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) shares her view, and he is entitled to. However, the majority of hon. Members do not share that view: not because we do not have the guts, but because we just take a different view—there is more than one point of view in the debate.

Drugs create a problem for the whole of society. They pose a potential nightmare for every parent: how do they know whether drugs are being offered to their children? How do they know in what circumstances that might happen? How do they know how their child might respond?

One of the central questions today has involved the complex issue of legalisation or decriminalisation. If we strip away all the emotion, it comes down to one question: will it help or will it hinder? To put it another way, would it reduce or exacerbate the problems? My firmly held view is that decriminalising or legalising drugs would be dangerous and irresponsible. It would encourage young people to believe that cannabis was okay. It would be an open door that could be pushed further.

Of course I understand that young people will not listen to lectures from people in suits. They will not listen to Members of Parliament. They think that we are out of date and out of touch, and from their point of view we are. However, that does not mean that they are deaf to everything that we say. Anyone with children knows that they want to know where the limits are. They want to know what is acceptable and then to push the boundary further. If we set the boundary a good deal further than it is at present, they will want to push it and then we will have opened a dangerous door indeed.

Frankly, legalisation or decriminalisation would be a fillip to the scum who profit from the sale of drugs to young people as it would be seen as an encouragement to their evil trade.

Mr. Flynn: Will the hon. Gentleman please look at the facts? In Holland, the evil people who deal in drugs on the black market, the totally irresponsible criminals, have been put out of business and have been replaced by regulated business men who can be controlled properly.

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that the Dutch Government and campaigners are satisfied that legalisation has solved the drugs problem in Holland, he should think again. Perhaps he should look at the facts. Everybody understands what has happened in Holland. Of course one could claim that, in a narrow sense, it has solved the problem, but if the hon. Gentleman thinks that it has discouraged young people from taking drugs, he is wrong. I disagree fundamentally with him. It is a misguided view that drug legalisation will help solve the drugs problem. It certainly has not achieved that in Holland.

In respect of health risks and crime, any relaxation of the drugs laws would be a disaster. If drugs were legalised or decriminalised, the inevitable result would be an increase in the number of drug addicts. Children and young people would be most at risk. Sir Paul Condon, who takes a serious view of what is happening in the metropolis, said:

"This is not simply a moral issue . . . It is also about the kind of society we want for our children. I do not want one where it is acceptable to be 'stoned' on drugs or where we pop into the cannabis shop to get the evening's supply."

He knows what he is talking about and the House should listen to him.

The Government are to be congratulated on the realistic, practical and flexible way in which they are tackling the problem. It is characteristic of the careful and thoughtful approach that we expect from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to such sensitive issues, as he has shown throughout Government and on the various issues that he has addressed.

I want to say a few words about enforcement. A prison sentence served by a drug trafficker no longer wipes out the debt. That is important. People should know that just because they go to prison, they will not keep the ill-gotten gains of their trade. It is now an offence to fail to report knowledge or suspicion of drug money laundering or knowingly to possess, use or acquire the proceeds of drugs trafficking. People should know that if they are associated in any way with that trade, they will be caught and punished.

Most persistent dealers in hard drugs are sent to prison, but the average sentence for a third offence is only four and half years and they are automatically released after serving only two and two thirds years. The Government White Paper "Protecting the Public" proposed the introduction of a stiff minimum mandatory sentence of seven years for those who are convicted of drug trafficking offences on three separate occasions. I hope that the measure will enjoy cross-party support when it comes to the Floor of the House as that would be in keeping with the spirit of the debate and of the remarks of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North.

The debate today has concentrated on drugs education. That is an important area. We know that drugs kill and that much work is being done in schools, with both local and central Government encouragement. The fact that drugs pose a fatal health risk—including the risk of contracting AIDS—must be brought home to all young people. Abstinence from drug taking is the only risk-free option.

Some people will continue to take drugs, regardless of the risk. Information and facilities—such as the provision of drinking water at rave parties—should be available for such people in order to reduce the risks and save lives. The Government are assisting the families of drug addicts by providing advice, counselling and support. Obviously, drug users must ultimately be weaned off drugs and the Department of Health task force must examine the effectiveness of drug treatment services.

Like all hon. Members, I believe that drugs are a menace to society and that the fight against them must be pursued rigorously on a cross-party basis. Effective action on drugs means reducing the supply of drugs, the demand for drugs and the health risks of drugs. We must form a united front and say that legalising drugs means legitimising drugs, with disastrous results and more drug abuse. I am very pleased that that approach has been soundly rejected today by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

1.52 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): May I be the last in a long list of hon. Members to add my congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on introducing the campaign against drugs. He has pursued his task with a verve and a dedication that amounts to what I can only describe as a moral crusade. I think that that is why the campaign has been so successful. Due to his actions, the Government strategy invests about £500 million per year in combating the drugs problem. That is undoubtedly having an effect nationwide and it has achieved considerable success in Sutton and Cheam.

Mr. Flynn rose—

Lady Olga Maitland: I shall not give way as time is short. A young man came into my surgery the other day. He was 25 and high on heroin and he told a tale of woe and tragedy. He was abused as a child and his parents were separated. He turned to crime and became the victim of blackmail. In short, the life of this articulate and essentially bright young man had been wrecked very early on.

It is interesting to consider why some young people are so vulnerable to drug abuse. I have my own views on that subject: I believe that, on the whole, those from stable families are less vulnerable to drug taking. However, I refer hon. Members to a report compiled by the University of Leicester, entitled "Drugs and Crime: A Study Amongst Young People In Leicester". The report found that young people from stable, two-parent households were less likely to take drugs, while those from households with a single female parent or with a mother and step-father or boyfriend were at the highest risk. As adults, we have a responsibility to young people. Unfortunately, the selfishness in society is wreaking havoc on the life chances of the young.

Drugs affect the life chances of the young in so many ways. I wish that we could put more effort into warning the young of the health dangers of taking drugs. I know that a campaign is being put out by the Department of Health on this, but how many young people realise that cannabis can cause cancer of the mouth and throat, that it can destroy their attention, and that it affects their memory? More than that, a young mother can affect her unborn child to a terrifying extent. Her baby could be born with defects. It could have an increased risk of leukaemia. We really must get the message across clearly not just that cigarette smoking can harm an unborn child but that taking drugs could as well.

We have covered a wide range of different topics on drugs. I shall devote just a few moments to the problems of solvent abuse. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister hinted to the Health Select Committee only yesterday that he hoped to be able to publish some good news about how the mortality rate for solvent abuse will go down, or is going down. Not a moment too soon are we making progress, but I urge him, however good the figures, not to rest there. Let us keep up a determined effort to combat solvent abuse.

I introduced a ten-minute Bill on solvent abuse a while ago and I continue to monitor progress in that field. One of the most terrifying things about solvents is that a young person can take one sniff and they are out. Out of this world—dead. It is a cruel, harsh way to go, and it is done through sheer ignorance. What is so tragic is that the figures show—I hope that they are going down—that two children die every week from solvent abuse. Even more damage themselves. The reason why they are so vulnerable is that solvents are so cheap. They are available. They are in every household.

Mr. Flynn: And they are legal.

Lady Olga Maitland: They are indeed legal, which is a great problem.

The trouble is that, in every household, one could find as many as 30 different products that contain solvents, which could harm people if used in the wrong way. It is not just an inner-city problem. Solvent abuse can happen in the leafiest, nicest suburb in this country, as indeed it does in my constituency. In Sutton, we have a remarkable drug advisory programme called the youth awareness programme, which has already been mentioned today. The director of that programme is a dynamic man called Stephen Baird. I pay public tribute to his efforts, because as a result of his work we are making real inroads into drug abuse in Sutton, particularly into solvent abuse. It was through him that I met some young people who had been taking solvents. What is so frightening is the ease with which they take them and the fact that they do it unnoticed. Many of them told me that, as a result of experimenting with solvents—it could be just sniffing a Tipp-Ex pen—they go on to other drugs, including cannabis. The story can get infinitely worse.

Some people say, "Nonsense. Many people just stop at that level." But if one person goes on to take another drug, that is one person too many. There are a couple of areas to which I hope the Minister will pay careful attention in terms of solvent abuse. Although I congratulate British aerosol manufacturers on taking a lead in issuing guidelines about solvents, I hope that the Government might consider making those guidelines statutory. That has always been on hold and we have not progressed it.

The industry must be encouraged to use non-solvent-based products. Why not give grants for research into substitutes? Above all, retailers must be educated about solvent-based products. It has been discovered that 43 per cent. of shopkeepers do not know which products can put young people at risk. Retailers must be taught how to question a child and to refuse to sell products to children who turn up at the counter with a dozen aerosol cans or a big supply of plastic bags.

We should make solvents tough to obtain if they can be used for illicit purposes. I hope that we can also ban all sales of butane gas lighter refills to those aged under 16. I realise that that puts a heavy onus on shopkeepers, but banning sales of certain products to those under 16 is not new. My private Member's Bill—the Offensive Weapons Bill—to ban the sale of knives to children under the age of 16 is passing through the House. Such a ban is perfectly possible.

I realise that time is running short, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I must congratulate the Government on their endeavours to bring drug education to schools, which is important. Teachers have been unable to cope with drug education for the good reason that they are not on drugs and they are not familiar with that field. The training programmes are helpful. Teachers in schools in my constituency say they need still more support, however, and I hope that the Government will take that into account.

The youth awareness programme has gone to all the schools in Sutton and has been very effective. The programme is working and young people are responding. The feedback shows that young people are showing much greater awareness and knowledge of drugs at a very young age—at seven, eight and nine years old. They get that understanding from older brothers and sisters, relatives or the world outside. The programme is important.

Finally, I pay tribute to the work being done in prisons. There are two prisons on the edge of my constituency—Downview and High Down. Downview deserves all the plaudits. I pay a special tribute to the prison governor, David Lancaster, who is the man who pushed the drug rehabilitation to continue. He began by allowing the Addictive Diseases Trust to set up a small unit. It began with one corridor becoming drug free, then one wing and now almost the whole prison is drug free. He finds that mandatory testing for drugs has produced excellent results. Only 6 per cent. of prisoners now fail a drugs test, whereas the national average is 37 or 38 per cent.

The experiences and lessons of Downview are undoubtedly to be followed elsewhere. I very much hope that more effort and resources will be put into prisons. I hope that we will realise that for every £1, £100 or £1,000 put into rehabilitation for prisoners, one less person is liable to reoffend on coming out of gaol.

This has been an important debate and it has focused on young people. I want to add my voice to the chorus telling the young, "Don't do it. Turn your face away from the temptation or you will wreck your lives."

2.3 pm

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): I am delighted to be here to give the Scottish perspective on the drugs problem. I recall the phrase, "If you remember the 1960s, you weren't there." I do remember the 1960s, which shows my conformity or lack of adventure. That phrase shows that drugs have been with us for quite a time.

Drugs know no borders. Two short years ago, I was in the Huagua valley in Peru watching people collect drugs and I realised that the drugs would end up on the streets of Edinburgh, Birmingham and London. There is an international perspective. I welcome the coalescence of the views of Government and Opposition on the problem.

In Scotland, the number of drugs crimes has increased since the Government came to power from 1,000 to 20,000—an increase of 1,500 per cent. The Government have engaged in discussions with the Opposition parties in Scotland to bring into life the Scotland Against Drugs campaign, which I shall mention later. The scale of the problem in Scotland, as in England and Wales, is a cause for the utmost concern.

A recent World Health Organisation study in Glasgow, which was jointly funded by the Medical Research Council, showed that Glasgow, not untypically for our major cities, has an estimated 10,000 injecting drug users. A study by the Greater Glasgow health board estimated that some 12,000 Glasgow patients are considered by their GPs to be misusing drugs. Scottish society views the problem of drug misuse not as a free-standing issue but as a continuing, socially destructive problem that cuts across the social and economic spectrum in Scotland. That is the reason for the coalescence of views.

A good example was the Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill, which came before the House a few months ago. It was designed to deal with raves in Scotland. It received its Second Reading in Glasgow in the Scottish Grand Committee on Monday 18 December. That was a poignant occasion, because on the previous Tuesday in Strathclyde, the 100th drug fatality had taken place: a young boy of 21 called Mark Hutcheson, who lived in Old Kilpatrick on the border of my constituency. He did not die at a rave but at home in his brother's arms, trying to rid himself of the craving for temazepam and Ecstasy. Another death, another family and community left devastated.

Drugs deflower our youth. The raves Bill was prompted by the three deaths at the Hangar 13 nightclub in Ayr. The Grand Committee took evidence from people in Glasgow, Inverness and Ayr. The professionals and people on the ground had conflicting views. There was no one, simple message. That is a lesson for politicians. The "Just say no" campaign is no good in itself because the problem is multifaceted. I remember the Department of Health's "Heroin screws you up" campaign of 10 years ago. That was launched on a wave of hopeful publicity only for retreat in disarray to follow when research revealed that the central figure—a cartoon character who starts off wholesome, affluent and confident only to sink into the trough of hopeless drug addiction despite his repeated claims that he can handle it—had the unintentional effect of turning young people on.

We have learnt in those 10 years. The raves Bill recommended chill-out areas in nightclubs, not because we condone drugs but because of the reality. In recommending them, we realised that there is a fine line between encouraging drugs and encouraging people not to take them. Given the scale of the problem, the risk is worth taking.

I also commend the Government on the co-operation they extended during our consideration of the raves Bill. It is a three-clause Bill, but having taken evidence, we realised that clause 1, the main clause, was defective. The Minister of State, myself and others reconsidered the Bill and tabled a new clause so that the Bill can help local authorities to deal with the problem. That Bill is an example of the parties working in tandem in the hope of formulating something worth while.

The Scotland Against Drugs campaign has eschewed the just say no philosophy. It is important to note that it involves no preaching or moral crusade. Young people see their friends taking Ecstasy and they think that it is safe, but it is not. We must get across its unpredictability.

Research has been conducted by the John Hopkins university in America on the effects of Ecstasy on rats and monkeys. It found that the neurons in the brain that produce the chemical serotonin, which helps to regulate mood, appetite, sleep and other functions, are affected by Ecstasy. It provides indirect evidence to suggest that one Ecstasy tablet damages the brain cells that produce that chemical. The key question for the researchers was whether the brain recovers from the effects of the Ecstasy tablet and they found that that of monkeys and rats did not recover.

It is clear that a young person can take one Ecstasy tablet, just like Leah Betts, and find, sadly, that it is one tablet too much. Our campaign is focusing on that unpredictability. We recognise young people's life style and we do not want to spoil it, but do they realise the implications of taking Ecstasy? The good research undertaken on cigarettes has meant that the health education message has got across, which has had a good effect on the country. The drugs campaign could have the same effect.

Mr. Flynn: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but we are sending out a dangerously false message. I, too, quoted the research that has been conducted on the effects of Ecstasy on neurons of the brain. It is wrong to say that Leah Betts died from Ecstasy. If she had taken Ecstasy on its own she would have been okay; if she had taken water on its own she would have been okay. It was the combination of the two that killed her. We are giving out the wrong message if we say to young people that they can take water as an antidote to Ecstasy. If they drink more than one pint of water an hour, combined with Ecstasy, it is a fatal dose.

Mr. McFall: I realise that Leah Betts drank too much water, but that proves the unpredictability of Ecstasy and the need for us to deal with the reality. My hon. Friend's comments may have intellectual, academic, lecture room validity, but they are shattered on the streets and in today's environment. In this debate we are trying to deal with the reality.

My hon. Friend also spoke about the Dutch policy on soft drugs. I take as my bible the 1994 Scottish Select Committee report, which I commend, on soft drugs and the Dutch policy. Members of that Committee visited Amsterdam and other cities, and they concluded:

"We are totally opposed to any experimentation with the Dutch approach to cannabis in Scotland. No large scale study of cannabis use has been carried out in the Netherlands and it is not therefore possible to draw any conclusions as to whether separating the supply of soft drugs from that of hard drugs . . . has had any effect on either cannabis use or on the decline in recruitment to heroin use. The successes which are claimed for the Dutch experiment could equally be accounted for by the success of education programmes and changes in youth fashions. At a time when Scotland faces a massive drug problem we believe that any move to decriminalise cannabis would send the wrong signal to young people."

That is the message that we wish to send out from our debate. That is why the Scotland Against Drugs campaign involves many people, including those in the media. The Evening Times of Glasgow has launched a campaign on which I congratulate it. We now have our own badge and logo. The campaign also involves sports personalities and young people to whom young people can relate. They do not relate to grey-haired, middle-aged politicians going around Scotland lecturing them. I have four children and trying to do that with them would fail. If it would fail for me and my kids, it would fail for the rest of society, so we engage people with whom young people can communicate and who are role models. The campaign has undertaken that.

Scottish Television hopes to undertake an initiative in November. It is electronically linking every secondary school in Scotland, engaging each school in a debate, putting questions and receiving instant answers electronically, so that young people have the opportunity to tell the rest of society what the position is and to debate among themselves.

The Scotland Against Drugs campaign is a broad spectrum, ranging from people who advocate harm reduction to those who advocate elimination. That is a fraught position; in the past, drugs campaigners have been split. That is where the weakness has been, so the campaign aims to keep them together.

Mr. David Bryce is a member of the Secretary of State's campaign committee—I recommended him personally. He is in charge of the Calton Athletic recovery group. I agree with the comments on the film "Trainspotting". Far from glamorising drugs, it shows what deprivation and paucity there is for people involved in drugs. The end of the film states that Calton Athletic will receive some of the film's profits.

David Bryce and his colleagues go about the country spreading their message. They aim "to deglamorise something that does have an attraction for young people. The campaigners' street credibility is high because they themselves are former users. Their workshop presentation has a catchy title—Cannabis to Chaos."

It is important for us to remember that title. There is a linear progression. David Bryce said:

"You have to admit that there is a fun element, but it doesn't last long. We explain about how the body builds up tolerances. We explain the effects on the family. We give them something to think about—about how others around them are getting hurt. By the time we finish they know about the real life of the user, the damage to their family, theft, prison, the police, HIV and hepatitis C."

That message is being spread today on Glasgow's streets. The Labour Front-Bench team and, I am sure, the Government endorse it.

On Monday, I introduced an Adjournment debate on suicides in Cornton Vale prison. Report after report has clearly shown the link between the incidence of drug taking and unemployment and deprivation. In our drug policies, we should have a twin-track approach. We should have the all-party approach on harm reduction and recognise the social dimension.

The debate was about Angela Bollan, a young girl aged 19, who was drug dependent. She ended up on remand in Cornton Vale prison for women in Scotland. She wrote to her parents the day before, seemingly bubbly, saying that she would like to see them in a few days' time. Sadly, she did not make it.

At her funeral in Alexandria, the Rev. Ian Millar gave a commentary on her and young children. He said:

"many hundreds of good and decent children are thrown on to the scrapheap of unemployment. The future to them seems devoid of any worth and meaning. Is it any wonder that many seek alternatives which might lift the gloom even if only for a moment.

I see a metamorphosis before my eyes. That catastrophic change which occurs when the bright and smiling youngsters of the primary school realise that their hopes and dreams of early years cannot be fulfilled. Despite the positive efforts of the school to promote their self-esteem, cynicism enters their soul and they give up on the system."

We do not wish that cynicism to enter young people's souls any more. That is why the Opposition are delighted to share with the Government in this debate and to put that message across. The main message is that we cannot do it alone. We will do it only together as a society. That is the message from the House of Commons today.

2.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): In the spirit of the last remark by the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), I thank everyone who has taken part in the debate, whatever their views.

The debate notes the first anniversary of "Tackling Drugs Together". Tributes were rightly paid to the Prime Minister, who launched it, and to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who drove it through and knocked heads together when necessary, who has ensured that we have 105 drug action teams throughout the country, with programmes of action, and who is ensuring that we go on into the second and third year—indeed the 10th year and beyond. Tributes were rightly paid to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), with his all-party group and the work that it does. I join in both those tributes.

I acknowledge the speeches of both Opposition spokesmen. Throughout the House, we acknowledge the work that has been done by the many agencies. I wish to highlight the tremendous work of the voluntary sector.

[Mr. John Bowis]

We are all united in our determination to help young people, in particular, to avoid getting hooked on drugs, to say no—which is the message that we give them—to understand why they must say no, and to help everyone to help them to say no. That is because, as we have heard in the debate and often previously, there are far too many examples in our society of young people who have not said no—sometimes young children—and that is a tragedy.

We also know that all the agencies must work together to cut the supply of and demand for drugs. Cutting the supply has often been mentioned in relation to police and customs work. The law and order side of tackling drugs is fundamental here and abroad, and we will continue to work with our national and international agencies and contacts on that.

If we cut only the supply, however, all we do is to increase the price on the market and on the streets; and, if the price increases, so does the demand to become involved in crime to pay for the habit. We must cut the demand at the same time as the supply.

Today, we bear in mind especially the trains that have hit the buffers. I think of the two sets of buffers that have been struck by two trains in particular—two families that have been destroyed.

The first is Leah Betts and her brave and courageous family. I salute the work that her parents have continued to do since their daughter's death, and the videotape whose production and circulation they have encouraged. It was a loving, close-knit family—no one would have thought that it had any of the problems that might have led Leah into drugs. Her parents suddenly found one day that their daughter was on the verge of death, and she went on to die, as a result of taking Ecstasy.

It does not matter whether it was the Ecstasy tablet, the water or the lack of salt; we know that that daughter died, she is not there now and we must learn lessons from that. That is the message from that family, and that is the message for all families: do not let your daughters or your sons think that they can safely take Ecstasy or any other so-called soft drug, because that did happen.

Tragically, we also know that the message of a death does not necessarily get through to young people. I well remember, on the day of Leah Betts' death, appearing on "Newsnight" with a group of people, including a young girl who was misusing drugs. That programme had communicated the message of what had happened and all the dangers. The girl was asked if she understood that message, and she said yes, but when asked if she would change her habit she said no—"It couldn't happen to me."

Of course it could happen to her, but death is less likely than health harm, so the health harm messages that have been highlighted by colleagues on both sides of the House are the paramount messages for us to get through, using the right people—not the grey hairs in suits—and the media that young people accept and understand. Then we may be able to help them to be aware of the risks to their physical and mental health, and so persuade them to say no when those temptations are placed before them.

The other train hitting a buffer is that of a family whose son I recall meeting in a drug rehabilitation residential centre. That young man had been through hell: he had gone down into a deep black hole; he had lost his health, his friends, his relationships, his family, his job, all his prospects and his self-respect. He was gradually being helped out of that hole by the dedicated team of professionals. When I stupidly asked him, "Do you think that you are getting on top of the problem?" He said, "No, and if I ever think that, I've lost. I have lifetime's struggle ahead of me to get off drugs." He was being realistic and, if someone has got to that stage, we should salute him. The House should unite to try to provide rehabilitation services to help people like that young man to climb out of such holes.

The subject of legalisation has frequently come up in today's debate. I am happy that the majority of hon. Members are united behind the message that there can be no legalisation. We do not accept the Ladywood message and I cannot accept the Newport message. Even the Liberals' royal commission is not a proposition that we can accept—for the reasons given by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring). Those reasons include the health effects of, and cancers caused by, cannabis. As the Labour-Front Bench team has also made clear, we would send a message to young people who seek to say no and are succeeding in doing so. What sort of message would we convey to those young people who are succeeding in saying no if today we said that we were thinking of legalising the substances after all?

Mr. Flynn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bowis: No. The hon. Gentleman has already taken up plenty of column inches and I must press on to answer the points raised, one of which, involving cannabis in medication, he raised. That is a serious issue and, as the hon. Gentleman knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has, for many years, licensed a number of researchers to possess cannabis for the purposes of research and therapeutic uses. If the evidence shows that there are benefits and a pharmaceutical company wishes to manufacture the drug, in principle, it can be used. It would, however, have to undergo the proper procedures for the approval of medicines.

The subject of treatment and its effectiveness has been raised many times. I am happy to say that the Polkinghorn report shows that treatment works. We have been able to continue the work of the long-term national treatment outcome research study, which will bring a great deal of help to those who are planning those services. We shall be issuing guidance to purchasers of services in the summer as well as looking at the clinical guidance.

The balance of resources has been mentioned in the debate. Of course, we always have to keep an eye on the relative costs of our activity. But of the £526 million spent in 1993-94, while £209 million was spent on police and customs enforcement, £165 million was spent on treatment, rehabilitation, prevention and education. The balance may not be as out of kilter as some people think. The bulk of the additional £34 million in the current year is spent on education, publicity and treatment, including treatment in prisons.

We must concentrate on helping young people, which is what so much of our work involves. The figures are worrying, but the hopeful sign is that, although a great many young people have experimented with drugs, in the past year the Health Education Authority's survey of 11 to 35-year-olds showed that, in the previous week, 7 per cent. had used cannabis, 1 per cent. had used speed and other drugs had been used by still fewer children.

It is not an epidemic—we can accept the challenge and help young people to come off drugs through effective advertising. We have done much in terms of radio broadcasting and through our 0800 776600 helpline, which in its first year has already taken 200,000 calls. We have achieved much through the diversion work, including work to encourage young people to find other interests, such as music, sport and fashion.

A good span of issues has been covered in the debate. We need concerted and determined action to tackle all aspects of the problem, stretching from the global to the individual. Globally, we must pursue and prosecute rigorously the organisers, the traffickers, the couriers and the money launderers; on a European level, we must pool knowledge, expertise and experience; at national level, we must define and finance a robust and concerted policy framework; at local level, we must pull together all the players who can make an impact in the communities that they serve; at family level, we need to support parents who are helping their children to resist the temptations of drugs.

We are not merely talking about personally rejecting drugs, turning a blind eye or casually accepting drugs as someone else's problem and some other family's tragedy. It is about making it plain that, whatever the short-term high and whatever the style gurus say, drugs damage individuals, families, communities and countries. We must confront the problem of drug misuse and make it clear that it is intolerable and not worth it. It is about not only explaining rationally the risks with which the individual misuser is toying, but making clear the wider impact, such as feeding local crime and providing a market for greedy opportunists whose curriculum vitae may include gun running, money laundering and terrorism.

Individual Ecstasy misusers may regard their drug taking as a bit of harmless fun, but the truth is that their decision to take the drug not only places their health at risk, but places them at the end of a chain of supply which is steeped in criminality and violence. It is the sum of those individual—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That the Speaker shall—

(1) at the sitting on Thursday 27th June, notwithstanding Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates), put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr. Michael Jack relating to Estimates, 1996–97 not later than Seven o'clock; and

(2) at any one sitting of the House, notwithstanding Standing Order No. 14A (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community documents), put the Questions on the Motions in the name of Mr. Secretary Gummer relating to Local Government (Structural Changes etc.) not later than three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the first such Motion; and the said Motions may be proceeded with, though opposed, after Ten o'clock.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

SOCIAL SECURITY (OVERPAYMENTS) BILL

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Social Security (Overpayments) Bill, notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a Second time.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Brandreth.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I am grateful for the opportunity provided by this debate on the changes to reduced earnings allowance, because many of my constituents, and people across the country, have been affected greatly by this monstrous cut in benefit. The cut was introduced without any consultation and certainly without a debate in this Chamber.

I will give the background to reduced earnings allowance so that we can put the debate in context. As the Minister knows, reduced earnings allowance was introduced in October 1986. It replaced the special hardship allowance, which was similar, but, in terms of nomenclature, the name "reduced earnings allowance" better fitted it.

The allowance is an award that is made to claimants who have a loss of faculty as a result of an industrial injury. Those claimants have been awarded a life disablement assessment for the disability resulting from the loss of faculty if that loss of faculty prevents them from being able to carry out their regular occupation or an occupation of equal standing. It is, therefore, really an extension of disablement pension which helps to make up lost earnings. The maximum payment under the current benefit rates is £39.60. I point out to the Minister that, for 90 per cent. of the recipients, the benefit does not cover their lost wages.

In September 1990, the Government saw fit to withdraw the benefit altogether, despite a report from their own advisers, the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council, saying that the benefit should be retained. IIAC put the argument to the Government that the benefit enabled employees who were in the early days of a crippling disease to take lighter work in a better environment and so, in some degree, to prevent the effects of that disease.

An example would be coal face workers who were diagnosed as suffering from pneumoconiosis who could afford to leave the coal face and to come into a dust-free atmosphere where their health would be helped and where their loss of earnings would be to some degree cushioned by the benefit. That benefit is no longer available and coal face workers will not be able to take other work, because there is no incentive. Men who are diagnosed as suffering from pneumoconiosis will now continue to work at the coal face.

The Government estimated that the withdrawal of reduced earnings allowance would save £140 million by 2001. At the time, the Government said that that money would be used for a new package of benefits, but I have seen no evidence of a new package of benefits and certainly no benefit of the same type as the reduced earnings allowance. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that.

The real focus of the debate is the Social Security (Industrial Injuries and Diseases) (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 1996, which were discussed by the Fourth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation on 8 May 1996. The provisions of the regulations were implemented on 24 March 1996. Under the regulations, men and women who reach retirement age lose their reduced earnings allowance and transfer to the retirement allowance, but the retirement allowance is paid at only 25 per cent. of the rate of the reduced earnings allowance.

The average loss of earnings is about £30 a week and the impact on couples living on state pensions has been dramatic. I see people regularly at my surgeries who bitterly complain that, as a result of the transfer to retirement allowance, they find it difficult to make ends meet. Men and women have the same problem, because women who used to work in factories were disabled through tenosynovitis. They were on reduced earnings allowance, but have been changed over to retirement allowance and they find it enormously difficult to adjust. I calculate that the reduction is equivalent to a reduction of about £9,000 in the salary of a Member of Parliament. Imagine the outcry if Members of Parliament suddenly found that their earnings had been reduced by £9,000.

The reduction in reduced earnings allowance and its application raises four important questions. The first is the impact on the individual, the group and the community. I am sure that the Minister would accept that the reduction affects some communities more than others. According to the latest Butterworth law text, in 1992, prescribed diseases accounted for only 19 per cent. of the 204,000 pensions paid. That 19 per cent., or about 38,000, comprised 15,000 pneumoconiosis pensions, 14,000 industrial deafness pensions and 9,000 others. Those figures clearly show that mining communities will contain the largest proportion of the 18,000 claimants—the Minister gave the figure in a written answer on 18 June 1996—who have had their benefit reduced to the retirement allowance. The bulk of the claims will come from mining communities.

Secondly, there is no transitional relief. The benefit cut has been introduced without any tapering. Many claimants have reduced pension rights because, after they suffered their injury or disease, they could not work or went on to light work. As a result, their contributions to any occupational pension scheme are much less than they would otherwise have been. It has to be understood that the majority of claimants would not have pursued a common law damages claim. The issue of pension rights has not been addressed. I contend that the reduced earnings allowance helped, in some way, to make up for reduced pension rights.

Thirdly, I refer to discrimination. For women, the cut-off point is 60 years of age; for men, it is 65. The Minister will be aware of several European Court cases that directly challenge this. As was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) when the regulations were discussed, one of the cases dealt with severe disablement allowance, which now ends at 65 for men and women. I accept that the Minister did not have a lot of time when he replied to that debate, but he did not address that issue. When he comes to the Dispatch Box today, will he tell us whether he intends to equalise the benefit cut-off at 65 for men and women? If that is not his intention, will he tell us why?

Fourthly, the regulation introduces a pernicious 12-months rule on retrospection, for which I believe there is no rationale. When I asked the Minister about this, he said that one does not backdate until the earnings capacity has been affected. We all accept that, but is the Minister aware of the way in which the good causes rule works?

I shall refer to that rule in a moment in relation to a case and show how it is used to scrutinise cases and how it can prevent reduced earnings allowance from being paid. There was already a restriction, and there is no need for the 12-months rule. In a written question, I asked the Minister about the thinking behind the rule, and he replied:

"reduced earnings allowance is designed to bring the allowance into line with other, non-industrial injuries, earnings replacement benefits . . . It is not justifiable to continue backdating payments in such claims indefinitely."—[Official Report, 6 June 1996; Vol. 278, c. 529.]

The Minister's response shows a lack of understanding of the matter. Some injuries have a long latency time, and diseases are the result of a development, not an event. I refer to diseases such as pneumoconiosis and asbestosis, which take years to develop. During that period, which can be as long as 20 or 30 years—in fact, I will refer to a case where it took 40 years—a man or a woman can have a reduced earnings capacity. For example, people may have to take a job paying a lower wage than they would have taken if the disease had not developed.

There is no logic in not allowing the claims to be backdated to the date of development. When tribunals decide whether there is to be backdating in industrial disease or injury cases, they always backdate to the date of development. In so far as we are talking about cases before 1990, the reduced earnings allowance should not be restricted by the 12-months rule.

I shall cite two examples from my constituency. First, I refer to Mr. Morris, who was a deputy at the time his injury occurred in 1985. He was struck by a rock that fell from the roof in a colliery and he was hospitalised for two weeks following the accident. He noticed the onset of a tremble, which was later diagnosed as Parkinson's disease. His common law claim was settled for £750. The chap never worked again, yet it took until 1994 for a new diagnosis to be made which persuaded the medical authorities that his condition related to his previous accident. In 1994, he was awarded a 70 per cent. disablement assessment backdated to the date of the accident.

Mr. Morris claimed backdated reduced earnings allowance, but unfortunately he was refused under the good causes rule. His wife was dealing with his affairs because the tremble had become so bad that he could no longer write. The form that she completed immediately after the accident, when my constituent had a closed final assessment, had an attachment advising her that she could apply for reduced earnings allowance. She did not fill in that form at the time. The wording of the form—as it was in 1985—was most ambiguous. As Mrs. Morris did not complete the form, the tribunal judged that she had not held good cause. We appealed to the commissioner, who upheld the tribunal's early decision.

That case is an example of the good causes rule scrutinising the backdating. As that applies in all such cases, there is no need for the 12-months restriction, nor can it be justified.

My second example relates to a constituent who suffers from an industrial disease—Ted Dudley, who operated a slusher machine during the 1950s and 1960s. You will know the purpose of those machines, Mr. Deputy Speaker; at the time, they had asbestos brake linings. Gradually, he developed a chest condition which worsened over the years. Towards the end of last year, it was established that he had a disease caused by a combination of particles of asbestos in his lungs and coal dust. The tribunal awarded him a 60 per cent. disablement assessment backdated.

In Mr. Dudley's case, there is no claim for reduced earnings allowance, as, when he changed to lighter work, the Coal Board maintained his wages at the rate they would have been had he continued working at the coal face. That is one example of a good employer. However, many employers would not be so understanding in their treatment of employees. In that case, it took 40 years for my constituent's disease to be diagnosed as relating to his employment. That illustrates the need for the ability to backdate the reduced earnings allowance. Although my constituent did not have reduced earnings, he could well have done.

Those two recent cases—there are many thousands more—show that the effects of an injury or a disease can be latent for many years. In my first example, the effects of an injury were latent for nine years. In the second, the effects of an industrial disease were latent for 40 years. The Minister knows that there is no rationale for the 12-months rule. I am asking him to come clean today and tell us whether there is justification for it. If, as I believe, there is not, is he prepared to reinstate the position to what it was before the regulations came into effect—to remove the 12-months restriction and allow the scrutiny to be made by the application of the good causes rule?

It seems to me that the savings made in relation to the suffering caused are very tiny. In a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), which appears at column 420 of the Official Report of 18 June 1996, the Minister said that just £25 million would be saved in the first year, 1996-97. That represents 0.03 per cent.—or three hundredths—of his Department's total expenditure. That amount would decline naturally in any case, as the recipients are elderly. However, that factor was not taken into consideration. Immense and needless suffering has been caused which I believe cannot be justified.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): I congratulate the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on obtaining this Adjournment debate and continuing the discussion about this important issue which he and I have had in different parts of the House. I agree with his first point: the subject affects particular individuals and communities more than others. It is obviously a matter of particular concern to the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

I am conscious of the fact that I have many questions to answer and only 10 minutes in which to do so. I shall try to deal with all the points that the hon. Gentleman raised. His second point related to transitional relief. I shall develop that argument in a moment when I explore what has happened in that area—who gets retirement allowance and who gets reduced earnings allowance. The issue is not whether there should be a change from one allowance to another, but what should cause and trigger that change. The previous rules were arbitrary and unfair and I shall explain why we do not believe that transitional relief is appropriate in those circumstances—although

[Mr. Roger Evans]

I understand why those who had the good fortune to receive reduced earnings allowance in circumstances that are not defensible as a matter of rational policy are distressed to find that it has come to an end.

The hon. Gentleman raised a third specific question of discrimination in European law and the ages of 60 and 65. Under the European directive, we are allowed to have unequal pension ages for women and men—although the Government have acknowledged for some time that the inequality must be remedied. We believe that we are legally entitled to apply it in the present context.

The hon. Gentleman also developed a fourth powerful argument, to which I listened carefully. It seems to me that he argues not that the backdating should take place from the date of the development of the condition, but that it should be backdated to the onset of the reduction in earning capacity. I recognise the force of that argument, and the hon. Gentleman has a lesser task in persuading me of its value. I can appreciate why he puts it that way, and I shall examine the two constituency cases that he mentioned to see whether they can cast any more light on the issue. I have not yet had a chance to examine them.

The general principle is: if the condition has deteriorated to the extent that it has manifested itself to the sufferer, one would expect that to have happened at the time when or before the lack of earning capacity began to have an effect. The reduced earnings allowance is designed to compensate people for the loss of earning capacity. If that is not correct or if it is argued that it is not appropriate according to the facts, I shall be happy to look into the matter. Generally, 12 months is the normal period for backdating income-related benefits and that is why we are attracted to it in this context.

Those are the four specific points that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. He began by calling this a monstrous and an unannounced cut. I understand that it may well seem like that to those who previously enjoyed the benefit, which has now ceased. However, if we examine the history of the matter, we see a rather different picture. There were vigorous debates in Parliament in 1988 about the fundamental issue of policy. Parliament resolved the issue, at the Government's instigation, to the effect that when people suffered loss of earning capacity, they received reduced earnings allowance, and when people retired, they received retirement allowance at a lesser rate in line with the fact that their pensions would be less as they had been less able to contribute to such a scheme as a result of their incapacity. That is why there are two rates. The real issue is not the way in which the scheme operates generally, but what is the trigger and the appropriate point at which one moves from receiving reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance. That is where the difficulty arises.

In 1988, the matter was relatively simple. If after pension age people continued to earn, they were caught by the pensioners' earnings rule, which was abolished in 1989. In other words, if people continued to make serious earnings after age 65, they were likely not to draw their old-age pension, because the rules stopped them, but they were entitled to continue to draw reduced earnings allowance, because they were still in work, suffering a reduction in earning capacity. That is why the benefit continued to be paid.

Accordingly, in the 1988 legislation, the trigger for passage from one benefit to the other was the drawing of the old-age pension. That was logical at the time. The difficulty arose the following year, when we abolished the pensioners' earnings rule. The difficulty, which became embodied in the 1989 legislation, was what the new test should be. Whether the full implications of the test on which the parliamentary draftsmen settled and which Parliament adopted were understood is another matter, but when the courts examined it, in effect the 1989 legislation said, "You move from one to the other when you have reached pensionable age and you give up regular employment."

The difficulty is that that envisages a two-stage process: first, someone reaches pensionable age; and, secondly, they give up regular employment. What happened—this is a classic point of law—is that people realised that if they gave up regular employment before they reached pensionable age, even by a day, the trigger could never take place. Some people managed, therefore, to pass from one benefit at a higher rate to a lower benefit simply because they retired on the first day of the month and gave up regular employment on the second, but the wily person—or the person who, for perfectly good reasons, gave up regular employment shortly before—could never lose the higher rate of benefit. That cannot be fair and it cannot be right.

The 1990 regulations gave the Secretary of State powers to make a ruling on what was considered to be regular employment. That rule remains in place. It is 10 hours a week averaged over five weeks. Before the changes, the intention was, and remains, that if someone over pensionable age is in regular employment and continues to earn, they can continue to draw reduced earnings allowance. If they give up regular employment under the new test, they will fall back on retirement allowance.

There were further difficulties with the way in which the parliamentary draftsmen had worded the legislation. A person had to attain retirement age and give up employment. The concept of giving up employment suggested that someone was doing so out of their own volition and choice. What happened when someone was made redundant? It appeared that they did not give up employment but were made redundant, so they remained on the higher rate of benefit and did not pass to the lesser rate of retirement allowance. To make matters even more horrific, as the case law developed, one can imagine the problems on the voluntary leaving of employment rule: "Were you sacked? Were you pushed? Who is to blame? You may or may not get benefit, depending on whether you are culpable." Comparable problems arose.

The result of all that was not just unfairness and a very arbitrary state of affairs, but a difficult position for the Benefits Agency. We decided that that state of affairs was wholly unsatisfactory, both as a matter of policy and as a matter of administration, so we laid the instrument that changed the rules from 24 March this year and left the position as it was always intended to be since 1988 as a matter of practice: if someone over pension age gives up regular employment, they get retirement allowance. If they continue in regular employment, they get reduced earnings allowance.

Because the intentional test of giving up employment had clearly been unsatisfactory, we decided that the only way to see whether it had been applied properly was to carry out a special exercise to identify all reduced earnings allowance recipients over pension age, and all retirement allowance recipients. They had to be identified through a case-by-case examination of the whole industrial injuries caseload, including closed files, totalling some 4 million. That exercise could not begin until we had sorted out the new regulations. Once the new regulations were in place, all the old cases found were revised by independent adjudicating officers, first to review the on-going entitlement to reduced earnings allowance after 14 March, in accordance with the new provision, and secondly to review whether the original decision to transfer those already on retirement allowance was correct.

The Benefits Agency identified 20,000 over pension age reduced earnings allowance cases and 12,000 retirement allowance cases—

The motion having been made at half-past Two o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 10 June 1996

ENVIRONMENT

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31408]

Sir Paul Beresford: Saxton Bampfylde International plc, an executive search agency, was employed in 1994–95 to assist with the recruitment of the chief planning inspector at a cost of £33,000. No other agencies were employed in that year or in 1995–96.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31521]

Sir Paul Beresford: Where it is necessary to procure high-level advice in search and selection not available within my Department, and where it represents good value for money to procure processing capacity to handle occasional recruitment exercises, in all cases within the requirements of the civil service commissioners.

Civil Servants (Duties Abroad)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much his Department spent during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96 on sending civil servants accompanying Ministers from his Department on official duties abroad. [32409]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not available centrally as costs of private office staff accompanying Ministers are included with costs for Ministers, while records for other officials are held with their corresponding divisions in the Department. This information would, therefore, be available only at disproportionate cost.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his powers to stop local authorities from acting in an anti-competitive way in respect of compulsory competitive tendering, with reference to his powers to compel local authorities to re-tender work where they have failed to ensure competition. [31976]

Sir Paul Beresford: Section 19A of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 and section 13 of the Local Government Act 1988 give my right hon. Friend the power to serve a notice on an authority which it appears to him has acted anti-competitively in deciding to undertake certain work. If, after the authority has responded to the notice, it still appears to him that the authority has acted in this way, he can give a direction under section 19B of the 1980 Act or section 14 of the 1988 Act. The direction may be a complete or partial bar on the authority's power to carry out the work or require the authority to fulfil conditions including retendering the work, before it has the power to continue to carry out all or part of the work. My right hon. Friend judges each case on its merits, but does so against the background of statutory guidance issued under section 9 of the Local Government Act 1992.

Terminal 5 Inquiry

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress made with and the expected time for completion of the Heathrow Terminal 5 inquiry. [30623]

Sir Paul Beresford: The public inquiry into the proposed terminal 5 at Heathrow airport, which began on 16 May 1995, is running close to its timetable. The timing and conduct of the inquiry is a matter for the inspector. On present estimates, it is expected that the inquiry will close in summer 1997, subject to an additional time which may be required to deal with recently published highway orders for links to the M25 and M4.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Feedstuffs

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements he is making for the disposal of surplus stocks of animal feed containing mammalian meat and bone meal following the recent ban on feeding mammalian meat and bone meal to farm livestock. [32479]

Mrs. Browning: The Government have today sent a letter to all livestock farmers, feed merchants and feed compounders in the United Kingdom offering to fund the collection and disposal of any residual stocks of MBM or feed containing MBM. Thereafter, after consultation with the appropriate organisations, an order will be laid to make it illegal to have MBM, or feed containing MBM, on farms or in the premises of feed merchants or at feed mills.

Parliamentary approval of this new service will be sought in a supplementary estimate for class III, vote 2—Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food: operational expenditure, agencies and departmental administration. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £6 million will be met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

Veterinary Fees

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assistance his Department provides towards payment of fees to veterinary surgeons for treatment of injured wildlife. [30792]

Mrs. Browning: No direct help is given towards payment of fees to veterinary surgeons for treatment of injured wildlife. The Pesticides Safety Directorate under the wildlife incident investigation scheme does arrange for disease incidents where pesticides may be involved to be investigated at no additional cost to the veterinary surgeon involved.

Mr. Jonathan Stirling

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, columns 139–40, when the inquiry into the performance of Mr. Jonathan Stirling as a licensed veterinary inspector was completed; and if he will make a statement on the conclusions. [31204]

Mrs. Browning: The investigations into the allegations made on the "Dispatches" programme have not yet been concluded.

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many local veterinary inspector-certified consignments of animals were exported through the port of Brightlingsea during 1995; and what proportion of consignments were certified by Mr. Jonathan Stirling. [31208]

Mrs. Browning: Some 1,048 consignments of animals certified by LVIs were exported through the port of Brightlingsea during 1995 of which 29 consignments were certified by Mr. Jonathan Stirling.

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, columns 139–40, in respect of which consignments certified by Mr. Jonathan Stirling for export animals were subsequently rejected by Ministry officials including and excluding animals rejected as unfit to travel under the Welfare of Animals During Transport Order 1994; and when such consignments arrived at Brightlingsea wharf (a) during 1995 and (b) from 1 January to 8 March. [31206]

Mrs. Browning: The answer is as follows:

(a) During 1995 of 29 consignments of animals certified for export by Mr. Jonathan Stirling, through the port of Brightlingsea, Ministry officials rejected as unfit to travel, one animal from one consignment on 13 February 1995 and two animals from one consignment on 21 June 1995.

(b) No animals have been exported from Brightlingsea so far during 1996.

Quarantine

Sir David Steel: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the annual cost to public funds in maintaining the six-month quarantine system. [31318]

Mrs. Browning: The annual cost was approximately £435,000 in the financial year 1995–96. This figure includes the cost of policy and administrative work on rabies in the industry's animal health group, some of which is not directly concerned with maintaining the six-month quarantine system, but this cannot be separately distinguished.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to reply to the written questions regarding quarantine tabled on 25 April. [32195]

Mrs. Browning: I answered one of the hon. Member's questions on 1 May 1996, Official Report, column 571, and the others have been answered today.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in what circumstances the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has access to animals in quarantine kennels; what plans he has to review these procedures; and if he will make a statement. [26651]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: The RSPCA is not able to enter quarantine premises as of right. However, anyone can go into quarantine premises with the permission of the premises owner. Additionally, licensed quarantine premises, all of which are privately owned, are inspected quarterly by MAFF veterinary officers who have the right to be accompanied by another person authorised by them and assisting them in their duties. I have no plans to change these procedures at present.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been (a) the total number of animals accepted by each quarantine kennel since 1990 and (b) the total number of animal deaths at each quarantine kennel since 1990. [26652]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: The number of animals licensed to enter quarantine in Great Britain from 1990 to 1995 was:

Year	Dogs	Cats	Other mammals
1990	5,999	3,687	150,631
1991	5,290	3,289	63,674
1992	5,175	3,190	61,320
1993	5,738	3,633	35,515
1994	5,554	3,863	31,620
1995	5,394	4,126	81,054

The number of animals which are recorded as having died in quarantine during the same period is:

Year	Dogs	Cats	Other mammals
1990	79	52	3
1991	49	34	20
1992	71	67	1
1993	72	93	5
1994	61	65	4
1995	61	56	4

Information concerning individual quarantine kennels is considered commercially confidential.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met with the Quarantine Kennel Owners Association; what matters were discussed; and if he will make a statement. [26654]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: I met members of both the Quarantine Kennel Owners Association and the Quarantine Kennel Professional Associates on 13 May 1996 to discuss animal welfare standards in quarantine kennels.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total revenue received by the Government from quarantine kennels in each of the last five financial years. [26656]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: The only revenue which the Government receive from quarantine kennels is that which comes from their ordinary payment of taxes. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food does not receive any direct revenue from quarantine kennels.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many animals have been imported into the United Kingdom through quarantine, by country, since 1991. [26650]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: Prior to April 1995, when a computerised licensing system was set up, quarantine records were filed under a manual system. Therefore, the historic information sought cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. I can, however, tell the hon. Member that, since that date, licences have been issued for the import of animals from 122 different countries. These are:

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how regularly quarantine kennels are required to be inspected by MAFF vets; under which legislation; and how many inspections of quarantine kennels by MAFF vets have taken place since April 1995. [26653]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: All 79 quarantine kennels authorised to operate in Great Britain must be inspected by MAFF veterinary staff at three monthly intervals to ensure that the standards required under the Rabies (Importation of Dogs, Cats and Other Mammals) Order 1974 are being maintained. Additional ad hoc inspections may also take place if the Ministry's local divisional veterinary manager considers them necessary. It would not be possible to quantify the total number of routine and ad hoc visits which had taken place since April 1995 without incurring disproportionate costs.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans to implement a statutory code of practice on animal welfare for quarantine kennels; and if he will make a statement. [26655]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 25 April 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), on 26 March, Official Report, column 528.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, column 640, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31455]

Mr. Boswell: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31497]

Mr. Boswell: None.

Beef Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a breakdown by country of imports of beef under heading 011 in (a) April 1995 and (b) April 1996. [31766]

Mrs. Browning: The latest month for which detailed official trade statistics are available is January 1996. The table shows imports of beef, under heading 011, for January 1995, April 1995 and January 1996, by country:

[1] Provisional

Slaughtered Cattle

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the exemptions he makes from his general policy of requiring the destruction of carcases of cattle over the age of 30 months; and what controls he has introduced to monitor such disposals. [31579]

Mr. Boswell: No such exemptions are made as the EC regulation (716/96) governing the over 30 months scheme requires destruction of the carcases.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to investigate allegations of abuse of the cattle disposal scheme with special reference to giving preference to dealers or farmers for improper reasons; and if he will make a statement. [31627]

Mr. Baldry: We have made it clear that abuses of the scheme will not be tolerated. Collection centres found to be breaching scheme rules will be removed from the scheme. No allegation of abuse of the kind referred to by the hon. Member has been substantiated. Anyone with a complaint about infringement of the rules has been invited to make it either to the Intervention Board or to the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he collates in respect of the 8,855 animals which were rejected as unfit to travel prior to export from the United Kingdom in 1995; and if he will make a statement. [32102]

Mrs. Browning: There is a considerable variety of circumstances in which animals may be rejected as unfit for an export journey. Central records are kept only of the numbers rejected.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 380, what were the ages of the 1,313 bovines and the 668 bovines exported from Great Britain to the Irish Republic in 1994 and 1995 and the 18,340 and 25,044 bovines exported from Great Britain in Northern Ireland in 1994 and 1995. [31785]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 7 June 1996]: The number of bovines exported to the Irish Republic were as recorded in the overseas trade statistics. These provide statistics on the exports from the United Kingdom as a whole and not just Great Britain.

The ages of bovines exported is not recorded within the overseas trade statistics, nor within the Animo system. However, so far as exports to the Republic of Ireland are concerned, Community rules in force since 1990 have prohibited the export from the UK to any member state of bovine animals over six months old.

Avoparcin

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on the use of avoparcin with particular reference to his assessment of the available data for the European Commission's Scientific Committee for Animal Nutrition. [31947]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 7 June 1996]: Avoparcin is authorised for use throughout the Community as an additive in animal feeds under directive 70/524/EEC. No feed additive is permitted unless it satisfies the criteria set out in the directive, including a requirement that, at the level permitted in feeding stuffs, it does not adversely affect human or animal health or the environment.

In July 1995, as a result of concerns expressed by Denmark, the Council of Ministers decided not to support the continued authorisation of avoparcin for use in feed for dairy cows. The Scientific Committee for Animal Nutrition has recently considered data presented by the Danish authorities and their report is expected to be made available to member states shortly.

The Government will continue to argue that any future decisions on the authorisation of avoparcin must be taken on the basis of good scientific evidence.

Food Labelling

Mr. Key: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the interested parties who were consulted in drawing up the guidelines which will accompany the consolidated food labelling regulations which will come into force on 1 July. [31572]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 7 June 1996]: Six hundred and sixty-four interested parties representing manufacturers, retailers, consumers, individuals and enforcement authorities have been consulted on the draft guidance notes. Seventy-one detailed responses were received and have been taken into account in preparing the final version.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Dover: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice and recommendations she has received from the British Veterinary Association regarding the steps needed to eradicate BSE from British herds. [31040]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 June 1996]: Ministers and officials regularly meet with representatives of the British Veterinary Association to discuss, amongst other things, BSE. Their advice and recommendations concerning proposals for the eradication of BSE are carefully considered and, where appropriate, reflected in the control measures.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31500]

Mr. Willetts: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 6 June 1996, Official Report, column 518.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 495 (1) how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31461]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 405, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31465]

Mr. Howard: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Karamanjit Singh Chahal

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement concerning the case of Karamanjit Singh Chahal. [31437]

Mr. Kirkhope: Mr. Chahal's case was heard by the European Court of Human Rights on 25 March. No judgment has yet been given.

Immigration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases during 1995 it was claimed his Department's presenting officers had misled immigration appeal adjudicators; and if he will make a statement. [31949]

Mr. Kirkhope: None of which I am aware. Presenting officers do not knowingly mislead adjudicators.

Mr. Sodagar Hussain

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he received a letter from the hon. Member for Bradford, West, dated 10 May, concerning the case of Mr. Sodagar Hussain who has applied to join his wife and children in the United Kingdom; if he will authorise a visa to be issued to Mr. Hussain on the basis of the job awaiting him in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [31950]

Mr. Kirkhope: The letter was received on 15 May and I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31406]

Mr. Howard: The following table gives information about the use of executive search or employment agencies in 1994–95 and 1995–96 for centrally managed recruitment schemes.

Supplier	1994–95	Number of staff recruited	1995–96	Number of staff recruited
RAS	*	49	*	97
Coopers and Lybrand	*	2	*	5

Bakers	—	—	*	4
Love Pirbhai Prichard	—	—	*	1
Jones Resourcing	—	—	*	1
Total	—	53	—	112

Information is not readily available about the use of employment agencies whether recruitment was conducted locally.

For reasons of commercial confidentiality, it is not our practice to disclose the size of the contracts awarded to individual agencies. However, the combined value of these contracts was £350,326 excluding value added tax in 1994–95 and £611,309 excluding value added tax in 1995–96.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search on employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31519]

Mr. Howard: Executive search or employment agencies are used in making appointments to the Home Office and its executive agencies where it is thought that they will be able to supplement usefully the field of applicants.

Child Support Agency

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many complaints have been received by the Data Protection Registrar relating to the Child Support Agency; [31999]

(2) what action is being taken by the Data Protection Registrar in respect of breaches of the Data Protection Act 1984 by the Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement. [32000]

Mr. Sackville: The Data Protection Registrar has received 457 letters of complaint about the Child Support Agency since it began operation in April 1993. Three hundred and thirty-two were investigated because they raised issues relating to compliance with the Data Protection Act 1984. In cases where the registrar felt there was a possibility of the 1984 Act being breached, she negotiated with the agency, which has subsequently altered its practices regarding disclosure of information. The registrar will make a statement on the current position in her next annual report to Parliament, which is due in July.

Pets (Quarantine)

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what administrative reforms would be required if the six-month quarantine system for pets were replaced by a vaccine-based system; and if he will make a statement. [31312]

Mrs. Browning: I have been asked to reply.

The present rules on quarantining of pet animals are set out in the Rabies (Importation of Dogs, Cats and Other Mammals) Order 1974. Any changes would require amendment to that order. Any vaccine-based scheme would need to be founded on proper vaccination before exposure to rabies infection, satisfying a blood test, conclusive identification and evidence of residency. A new system for processing applications as well as inspection arrangements to ensure that the rules were properly complied with would need to be put in place.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31512]

Mr. John M. Taylor: No specific instructions were issued in respect of flying the European flag on 8 May. It is not our general practice to fly the European flag from Government buildings. On appropriate occasions, such as the UK's presidency of the European Community in 1992, it has, however, been flown.

Privatised Utilities

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the annual profit of (a) British Gas, (b) Central Electricity Generating Board, (c) each of the previously publicly owned water companies and (d) British Telecom in each year since 1979. [31760]

Mr. Page: The information requested is published in the accounts of the nationalised utilities and in the annual reports of the privatised utility companies. Information on the water companies is published in the Office of Water Services' "1994–95 Report on the Financial Performance and Capital Investment of the Water Companies in England and Wales". Copies of all of these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Encryption Services

Mr. Luff: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Government have yet decided how encryption services may be provided for business and commerce. [32544]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Following the discussion between Departments to which I referred in my replies to the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) of 6 March 1996, Official Report, column 229, and 25 March 1996, Official Report, column 411, I am today publishing a paper outlining the Government's policy on the provision of encryption services on public networks. Copies of the paper are available in the Library of both Houses.

The Government aim to facilitate the development of electronic commerce on the emerging global information infrastructure. This is of significant importance in maintaining the UK's competitiveness and is a component of the Department's information society initiative. There is a growing demand for encryption services to safeguard the integrity and confidentiality of electronic information transmitted on public telecommunications networks. The Government therefore propose to make arrangements for licensing trusted third parties who would provide such services. These TTPs would offer digital signature, data integrity and retrieval, key management and other services for which there is a commercial demand. The licensing policy will aim to protect consumers as well as to preserve the ability of the intelligence and law enforcement agencies to fight serious crime and terrorism by establishing procedures for disclosure to them of the encryption keys, under safeguards similar to those which already exist for warranted interception under the Interception of Communications Act 1985.

Officials within my Department have held preliminary discussions with industry groups on the concepts set out in the paper. The Government intend to bring forward proposals for legislation following consultation by the Department of Trade and Industry on detailed policy proposals.

Magnox Electric plc

Mr. Luff: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the objectives he has set for Magnox Electric plc. [32545]

Mr. Eggar: Yes. The Government wish Magnox Electric plc to be a robust public sector entity which will enhance competition in the electricity market and secure the best possible value for the tax payer from its operations. The company must operate in a commercial manner, judging any investment by commercial rates of return. In doing so, it must:

1. demonstrate in all its activities that safety is the foundation of its business;
2. have full regard to the environmental impact of all its operations;
3. maximise net revenue from electricity sales by operating its generating plant as fully, and for as long, as is consistent with safety requirements;
4. meet all its nuclear liabilities as cost effectively as possible;
5. maintain and develop its core skills and capabilities to meet its current and future operational needs. Magnox may exploit these skills and capabilities in appropriate new business areas, as agreed with the Government; and
6. seek a basis for integration with British Nuclear Fuels which will provide the combined company with a clear incentive to maximise the net revenues from magnox generation and to minimise all Magnox-related reprocessing and other back end costs.

Insurance Ombudsman

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to extend the powers of the insurance ombudsman to cover insurance policies taken out by commercial concerns. [32160]

Mr. Nelson: None. The insurance ombudsman bureau is a voluntary body established and paid for by the insurance industry. Any changes to the scheme would therefore be a matter for the industry to decide.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Darling: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cases of alleged insider dealing have been (a) reported for investigation, (b) referred for prosecution and (c) prosecuted before the courts since the coming into force of the Criminal Justice Act 1993. [32056]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Since the coming into force on 1 March 1994 of the Criminal Justice Act 1993, 52 cases of possible insider dealing have been reported to my Department, leading to the appointment of inspectors in 25 instances, of which inquiries in respect of 14 are still continuing. In this period, four prosecutions, involving five defendants, have been commenced of which one is under the new legislation.

Mr. Darling: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cases of alleged insider dealing have been (a) referred for prosecution and (b) the subject of conviction since 1980. [32057]

Mr. Taylor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans) on 21 March 1995, Official Report, column 183. The report, "Companies in 1994–95", has now been published and a copy is available in the Library of the House.

Since 1 April 1995, a further 32 referrals have been made from the London stock exchange leading to 16 appointments of inspectors. There has been one conviction.

Exporters Database

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to institute a national database of British exporters. [31910]

Mr. Nelson: The Government have no plans to provide a national database of exporters. This kind of professional information gathering is best left to the private sector and the UK already leads the world with a number of companies producing excellent commercial database. My Department is currently looking at ways of helping the private sector to set up trade directions on the Internet.

Patents

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total of patents registered in (a) the United Kingdom Patent Office and (b) the European Patent Office in each of the past five years. [32096]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The total number of patents granted in each of the last five years at the United Kingdom Patent Office and the European Patent office is shown:

Year	UK Patent Office	European Patent Office
1995	9,475	41,609
1994	9,530	42,001
1993	8,330	36,664
1992	9,421	30,409
1991	9,346	26,642

Euro 96

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what evidence he has that counterfeit merchandise for Euro 96 is being imported into the United Kingdom. [31830]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I understand from HM customs that two seizures of goods which infringe UEFA's registered trade mark have been made.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the estimated annual saving to business from the Deregulation (Rag Flock and Other Filling Materials) Order 1996. [31385]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The burdens by this order fall both on suppliers of fillings for beds, furniture and toys and on the manufacturers of such items. In view of the diversity of these industries, it has not been possible to construct reliable estimates of the total direct and indirect cost savings the order will achieve. However, one firm, which is the biggest single producer of fillings in the UK, estimates that the cost of testing alone to demonstrate compliance with the rag flock legislation is in its case £4,000 each year. Despite the difficulties associated with determining total figures for the whole industry, informal inquiries have suggested that direct cost savings could be, for the fillings industry alone, over £100,000, for each year after the burdens are removed. Total savings to suppliers and manufacturers should therefore be well in excess of this figure.

Business Links

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what work has been done by his Department to evaluate the Danish broker model within business links and training and enterprise councils. [31891]

Mr. Page: A business networking project based on the Danish broker model has already been piloted in the south-west. Business networking was one of three key areas identified for support under the second competitive White Paper, Cm 2867. As such, it figures prominently amongst the projects being developed throughout the country by TECs and business link partnerships.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of British companies are so far included in business links databases. [31909]

Mr. Page: The latest management information returns, which cover about two thirds of the country, indicate that some 617,000 businesses are registered on business link databases. This represents approximately 47 per cent. of the 1.32 million value added tax registered businesses in England. The requirement is for business links to record on their databases details of businesses with 10 or more employees, but many business links include other businesses.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade to which Government Department he expects business links to answer primarily. [31908]

Mr. Page: Although business links receive considerable financial and other support from the Government, they are not Government agencies. As such they do not "answer" to any particular Government Department. They are, however, required to show the Departments which provide financial support that public funds have been used for the purposes intended. In addition, business links must meet the accreditation and branding requirements specified by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade as agreed with national business link partners.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to ensure that business links databases are integrated into a national database of exporters. [31904]

Mr. Page: All business links are required to collect common core information for all businesses with 10 employees or more, including whether companies are exporters and, if so, the percentage of sales that are exported, and be able to output this information in a common form.

Business links are private companies. Decisions on whether to integrate this information into national databases is a matter for them to consider on a commercial basis.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what guidance his Department issues to business links regarding the largest companies which should receive their services. [31906]

Mr. Page: Each business link is expected to provide a service to firms of widely differing sizes. The business link prospectus suggested a need to concentrate its services on businesses with between 10 and 200 employees. In developing business links, however, it has become clear that the real target is firms with the potential to grow, not firms of a particular size.

ISO 9000 Status

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many firms with under (a) 10, (b) 20, (c) 50 and (d) 100 employees have attained Internation Standard Organisation 9000 status. [31948]

Mr. Page: My Department does not hold comprehensive information concerning the size of firms assessed to ISO 9000. The 1996 edition of the DTI QA register, "The United Kingdom Register of Quality Assessed Companies", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House, lists some 51,500 organisations which have attained accredited certification to ISO 9000. Entries in the register are voluntary and there is no breakdown by size of organisation.

Torness Power Station

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will make a statement on warnings given by the nuclear installations inspectorate concerning the failure of maintenance requirements of Torness power station to match the safety case with particular reference to the shortage of suitably qualified and experienced personnel at Torness and safety problems arising from the employment of outside contractors; [31624]

(2) if he will take measures to increase the provision of maintenance staff and in-house provision at Torness power station; and if he will notify those bidding for shares in British Energy of his proposals in this area. [31625]

Mr. Eggar [holding answers 7 June 1996]: Scottish Nuclear put forward a safety case to the nuclear installations inspectorate on proposals to make modifications to the maintenance regime of Torness power station. The NII raised some apparent discrepancies with Scottish Nuclear about what was written in the safety case and what was actually in place. Scottish Nuclear reacted promptly and effectively to those concerns. The NII is satisfied with the range of improvements which Scottish Nuclear implemented to its procedures.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

West Bank and Gaza Strip

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the British Government plan to take through bilateral and international aid programmes to improve hospital bed availability in the west bank and Gaza strip. [31868]

Mr. Hanley: The Overseas Development Administration is helping the Palestinian Ministry of Health to strengthen its management capacity through a three-year project. The project's goals include improved planning and management of hospital services, and increased utilisation rates and hospital bed availability. The team of ODA-funded health consultants led by Sir Duncan Nicholl is working alongside a World Bank-funded programme which constitutes a part of its $20 million education and health rehabilitation credit.

The EU is financing the construction of a 232-bed general hospital near Gaza city. Construction began in October 1993, commissioning will begin in the early autumn, and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency which administers the hospital expects it to be fully operational by March 1997. The UK share of the £18 million cost will be over £3 million. There has also been substantial UK involvement in the hospital's design and construction.

UNRWA, to whose core budget the UK makes annual contributions, is upgrading a small cottage hospital in the west bank.

Miss Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the annual amount spent by the United Kingdom Government through bilateral and international aid programmes on the provision of health care in the west bank and Gaza strip for the period 1970 to 1996. [31870]

Mr. Hanley: The ODA's record of expenditure on assistance to the health sector in the west bank and Gaza strip does not date back to 1970. The following table shows UK bilateral aid, and assistance through the EC and UNRWA, since 1978–98. Assistance from the World bank for the west bank and Gaza is only just starting: it has recently declared a $20 million education and health rehabilitation credit effective.

UK aid flows to occupied territories/west bank Gaza strip health sector 1987–88 to 1995–96

UK financial year	ODA bilateral[1]	EC[2]	UNRWA[3]	Total £'000s
1987–88	137	74	—	211
1988–89	148	81	—	229
1989–90	198	211	—	419
1990–91	247	240	—	487
1991–92	534	1,782	—	2,316
1992–93	565	987	—	1,552
1993–94	510	1,120	—	1,630
1994–95	420	776	—	1,296
1995–96	636	2,300	45	2,981

Notes:

[1] ODA bilateral: constitutes regular bilateral programme, Emergency Aid and Joint Funding Scheme flows.

[2] EC: based on exchange rate of 1 Ecu: £0.80, and UK average share over the period of 16 per cent. of total EU programme.

[3] UNRWA: Figure refers to year one of third year £400,000 ODA-funded Family Health Project. Both UK and EU make regular annual contributions to UNRWA's core programme budget which includes health sector activities. These cannot be disaggregated.

Miss Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what existing measures the British Government support through bilateral and international aid programmes which assist polytechnic education to train technical and managerial workers in the west bank and Gaza strip; and what is the United Kingdom financial contribution to such programmes; [31871]

(2) what was the annual amount spent by the United Kingdom Government through bilateral and international aid programmes on the provision of polytechnic education in the west bank and Gaza strip for the period 1970 to 1996; [31867]

(3) what future steps the British Government plan to take through bilateral and international aid programmes to assist the development of polytechnical education to train technical and managerial workers in the west bank and Gaza strip. [31869]

Mr. Hanley: The United Kingdom bilateral aid programme for west bank and Gaza does not fund tertiary level education projects.

The European Union is providing running cost support in 1996 for nine universities and 12 community colleges. Four of the community colleges—the term polytechnic is rarely used in west bank and Gaza—are technical or management colleges. Their share of the support will total 1.96 million ecu—£1.64 million—of which about 16 per cent. can be attributed to the UK.

TREASURY

Kenya

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement about the International Monetary Fund's enhanced structural adjustment facility for Kenya. [30596]

Mrs. Anglea Knight: A three-year programme under the enhanced structural adjustment facility worth SDR 149.55 million, was approved by the IMF board on 26 April.

Works of Art

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost of the conditional exempt works of art inheritance tax rules to the Inland Revenue at constant values in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) 1995. [31209]

Mr. Jack: The estimated cost to the Exchequer of granting conditional exemption from inheritance tax and capital transfer tax to works of art and chattels is:

Year	£ million at 1994–95 prices[1]
1984–85	64 million
1989–90	123 million
1994–95	55 million

[1] Converted using the GDP market deflator.

A comparable figure for 1979–80 is not available. The exemption is conditional, not absolute. Its broad effect is to defer payment of tax on the qualifying items for so long as the conditions of the exemption are met.

Abortions

Sir David Steel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many abortions (a) in total and (b) per 1,000 women were carried out in England and Wales in 1995. [31316]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information requested is not yet available. Abortion data for the first three quarters of 1995 have been published in Office of Population Censuses and Surveys/Office of National Statistics monitors AB96/1, AB96/2, AB9/3 and are available in the House of Commons Library. The December quarter monitor is expected to be published on 27 June 1996. The 1995 annual monitors are expected to be published in September 1996.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31501]

Mrs. Angela Knight: No European Union flags were flown by the Treasury or the Chancellor's agencies on 8 May 1996.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 257, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31444]

Mrs. Angela Knight: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of (a) the cost to a family of four of the common agricultural policy and (b) the pecuniary benefit which such a family derives from United Kingdom membership of the EEC. [31761]

Mr. Waldegrave: The common agricultural policy imposes costs on consumers estimated for 1993 at some £3 per week per person. A note setting out the calculations of the costs to United Kingdom taxpayers and consumers has been placed in Library of the House.

However, while such an assessment of the costs of the CAP can be made, to carry out an assessment of the pecuniary and wider benefits of UK membership of the European Union for a family of four would be time consuming and expensive. It would not be possible to disentangle the direct impact of EU membership over more than two decades from changes which are due to other factors.

Exports

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact on exports of changes in the strength of the pound against other currencies since January 1996. [31932]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The latest trade data, to March, show that the volume of United Kingdom exports of goods—excluding oil and erratics—increased by over three per cent. in the first quarter of 1996 compared with the previous quarter. However, exports depend on a wide range of factors, of which the exchange rate is only one, and it is difficult to disentangle the various influences. In any case, the sterling effective exchange rate index changed little between January and April 1996.

Assets

Sir Peter Hordern: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people over 60 years have assets of £50,000 or more at the latest available date; and how many such people there were five years ago and 10 years ago. [31548]

Mr. Jack: The available information is as follows. I regret that separate estimates for people over 60 years are not available.

Adults in the United Kingdom with net marketable wealth[1] of £50,000 or more

Year	Estimated number
1983	3 million
1988	6 million
1993	10 million

[1] Includes all assets held by individuals for which a value can be immediately realised, net of liabilities, but excludes the values of accrued pension rights.

Obstetrics

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total number of (a) live births, (b) stillbirths and (c) maternities which occurred in England and Wales in 1995 and the number of each which occurred in (i) NHS hospitals without consultant obstetric units, (ii) NHS hospitals with obstetric units, (iii) other hospitals, (iv) at home and (v) elsewhere. [31855]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Available data requested are shown in the table.

Births and maternities in England and Wales by place of confinement, 1995

	Live births	Stillbirths	Maternities
NHS hospitals	632,378	3,530	626,633
Non-NHS hospitals	2,689	14	2,667
At home	12,464	41	12,487
Elsewhere	607	15	617
Total	648,138	3,600	642,404

Separate figures for different kinds of NHS hospital have not been collected centrally since 1992, when 98.6 per cent. of all maternities in NHS hospitals occurred in hospitals with consultant obstetric units.

Earnings Statistics

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the number and proportion of manual, non-manual and part-time employees on adult rates earning less than (a) £3.95, (b) £5.26 and (c) £5.52 per hour, excluding overtime payments, in total and for (i) men and (ii) women and by (1) standard economic region, (2) each county in England and Wales, (3) each London borough and Greater London as a whole, (4) each regional authority and borough in Scotland and (5) Great Britain as a whole for April 1992; [31175]

(2) if he will list the number and proportion of manual, non-manual and all full-time employees on adult rates earning less than (a) £148.13, (b) £197.25 and (c) £207.13 per week, excluding overtime payments, in total and for (i) men and (ii) women and by (1) standard economic region, (2) each county in England and Wales, (3) each London borough and Greater London as a whole, (4) each regional authority and borough in Scotland and (5) Great Britain as a whole for April 1992. [31174]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I am placing the available information from the "New Earnings Survey" in the House of Commons Library.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated annual saving to business from the Deregulation (Bills of Exchange) Order 1996. [31384]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Association for Payment Clearing Services has estimated that savings to the banking industry will be in the region of £30 million a year.

Custody Services Regulation

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish his consultation document on extending the scope of the Financial Services Act 1986 to cover regulation of custody services. [32549]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have today published the consultation document. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House. Comments are invited by the end of August.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30778]

Sir John Wheeler: At 1 May 1996 there 1,120 staff in the Northern Ireland Civil Service—3.96 per cent. of the service—who self-reported a disability. Of these 450—1.6 per cent. of the service—were, or had been, registered as disabled. In addition, 71 registered disabled people are working in the Northern Ireland civil service under the employment support programme.

Of the home civil service staff in the Northern Ireland Office two are known to be registered disabled—0.9 per cent. of the work force.

Postal and Proxy Votes

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applicants for postal or proxy votes for the election to be held on 30 May, have been refused by the chief electoral officer because they stated that they would be on holiday; what plans he has to take steps to reverse this ruling; and if he will advise the chief electoral officer to amend the existing application form so that applicants know to state where they will be on holiday. [30832]

Mr. Ancram: A total of 56 applications for a postal or proxy vote were refused to individuals who cited leave or holiday as the reason for recruiting an absent vote for the 30 May election. The precise reasons for the refusals in these cases are, however, a matter for the chief electoral officer alone to consider. The application form that is used by those wishing to apply for a one-off postal or proxy vote at a particular election already advises in the notes on the reverse of the form that the applicant should indicate where he or she will be on holiday.

Fisheries

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much Pesca funding is available for fishery projects in Northern Ireland in 1996–97; how much was paid in 1995–96; and if he will list those projects funded and the amount each project received. [32192]

Sir John Wheeler: The financial information for the Pesca programme is available only on the basis of calendar year and not financial year as requested.

The funding available for measure 3 fisheries projects in 1996 and 1997 is as follows:

1996: £67,000

1997: £76,000

There was no expenditure incurred on fisheries projects in 1995–96 financial year.

A nil return should be recorded against list of projects funded and amount each project received.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Assets)

16. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the value of (a) land, (b) property and (c) rolling stock and other railway assets in the ownership of British Rail. [30616]

Mr. Watts: British Rail's 1994–95 annual report and accounts show that the total value of BR's fixed assets was £2,748 million at 31 March 1995. The annual report and accounts for year end 1995–96 are being audited and will be published in July.

Official Travel

19. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of his travel on official business has been undertaken by rail in the last year. [30620]

Sir George Young: I travel regularly to work by rail and, during the last year, I travelled by train on approximately 75 per cent. of official visits in the UK outside London. On Friday, I travelled on seven separate trains.

Public Transport

25. Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to increase public transport use; and if he will make a statement. [30628]

Mr. Norris: We aim to increase the attractions of public transport through targeted public investment and through greater involvement of the private sector in offering the services people want.

Airport Capacity

26. Sir Alan Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to respond to the Second report of the Transport Committee on United Kingdom airport capacity, HC67, Session 1995–96. [30629]

Sir George Young: I received the report towards the end of last month and aim to respond as soon as possible.

Bus Lanes (London)

27. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to review the economic impact of the introduction of bus lanes in London; and if he will make a statement. [30630]

Mr. Norris: We are currently updating our guidance note "Keeping Buses Moving". However, I have no doubt that bus priority measures in London are delivering real benefit, and this is reflected in our commitment to complete the bus priority network by 2003.

Disabled Parking

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department has taken to examine misuse of the orange badge parking concession scheme; and what plans he has to curb such abuse. [31873]

Mr. Norris: Following a comprehensive review of the working of the scheme new regulations were introduced in 1992 which, among other things, sought to reduce abuse of the scheme by making enforcement easier. We are seeking a legislative opportunity for the creation of new powers which will allow traffic wardens and parking attendants to inspect orange badges on demand.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures his Department has implemented during the last 12 months, to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with his Department and its executive agencies; and what progress his Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31536]

Mr. Norris: The Department advertises all promotions, internal vacancies and open competitions on an equal opportunity basis. During the last 12 months, women have been among those particularly encouraged to apply. Over the last five years, the Department has run courses designed to specifically develop the potential of women in management positions. The Department is actively involved in Opportunity 2000.

National Rail Network

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his assessment of the future of the national rail network; and if he will make a statement. [30615]

Sir George Young: The future of the national rail network is more assured than ever as a result of our privatisation programme. Railtrack, now in the private sector, has published a 10-year plan to spend well over £1 billion per annum on the network. Passenger services are being transferred to the private sector, with, for the first time, key services and network benefits legally guaranteed through franchise contracts.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31513]

Mr. Norris: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 6 June, Official Report, column 518, by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis).

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31415]

Mr. Norris: My Department has used Recruitment and Assessment Services and other specialist recruitment agencies for external recruitment. The total number of staff recruited using these services was 19, for the 1994–95 financial year, and 223 for 1995–96. The overall estimated recruitment costs including agency costs—which are not separately identified—in each financial year was in the order of £300,000. The following agencies were employed in the period in question:

Recruitment and Assessment Services
Link-up Recruitment
Murray and Co.
Harrison and Willis
Saxton Bampfylde International plc
NB Selection Ltd.
Sanders and Sidney Outplacement Consultant Beechwood Executive Search Prospect Recruitment Ltd.
Comtex Solutions
Principal People
PTC

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31400]

Mr. Norris: The figures requested for recruitment in my Department are contained in the following table.

	CTG	DSA	DVLA	VCA	TCA	HA	MSA	VIEA	TRL	Totals

VCA = Vehicle Certification Agency.
TCA = The Coast-Guard Agency.
HA = High-Ways Agency.
MSA = Marine Safety Agency.
VIEA = Vehicle Inspectorate.
TRL = Transport Research Laboratory privatised April 1996.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31528]

Mr. Norris: The Department and its executive agencies use executive search or employment agencies where it is felt that this provides a better and more cost-effective service than the normal recruitment methods.

Railway Investment

18. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on future likely levels of investment in Britain's rail network. [30619]

Mr. Watts: Investment in the rail network has been at record levels in recent years and is expected to rise following the privatisation of railtrack and other rail businesses.

Rail Freight

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the impact of rail privatisation on the amount of freight carried by rail rather than road. [30612]

Mr. Watts: I expect rail freight privatisation to be a resounding success. Both North and South Railways and the new owners of Freightliner have ambitions to develop the rail freight market.

Railway Research Projects

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people are employed by British Rail on railway research projects; and if he will list the current projects. [31591]

Mr. Watts: The number of people employed by BR on railway research projects, and the nature of those projects, is a commercial matter for BR.

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the locations of all sections of motorway which have overhead lighting, by parliamentary constituency. [31599]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Frank Field, dated 10 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to write to you in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the location of overhead lighting on motorways. You asked for this information by parliamentary constituency.

The Highways Agency's locational information for road lighting does not include references to parliamentary constituencies. The lengths of motorway in England with overhead lighting are however recorded and these are identified on the attached table.

The Agency does not have information about the short lengths of principal road motorway in England or the motorways in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

The following sections of motorway, in England, contain stretches of road lighting:

Motorway	From junction	To junction	Kilometres	Miles

Driving Tests

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library the codes of practice on standards of road testing for licensing drivers of motor vehicles, including heavy lorries, in each member state of the European Community. [32015]

Mr. Norris: All member states comply with, or are taking steps to comply with, Council directive 91/439/EEC on driving licences which is available in the Library. Annexe II of the directive sets out, among other things, the contents of the practical driving test for motor vehicles, including heavy lorries, and provisions on the manner of assessing candidates by examiners and on the training and supervision of examiners.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to have large signs showing maximum permitted speeds alongside all speed camera signs; and if he will make a statement. [32047]

Mr. Norris: Existing legislation requires all speed limits to be signed. I do not propose additional requirements to add speed limit repeater signs alongside enforcement camera signs. On urban roads where there is a 30 mph limit, repeater signs may be used only where there is no street lighting to indicae the presence of the speed limit. Inconsistent use of repeater signs would lead to enforcement difficulties arising through drivers claiming uncertainty about which limit is in force. The west London enforcement camera trial clearly showed that drivers—who slow down when approaching known camera sites—know the limits in force.

Traffic Area Network

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his plans are for reorganising the traffic area network. [32552]

Mr. Norris: In order to streamline the work and reduce the costs of the traffic areas, the work of the current eight offices will be reorganised into six offices, each with its own traffic commissioner. The offices in Cardiff and Manchester will be closed in 1997. It will be our objective to resolve the problems of staff surpluses by voluntary redundancy means wherever possible through offers of voluntary redundancy and by identifying alternative job opportunities in DOT agencies and other Government Departments for staff in these two offices who wish to remain in the civil service.

We shall be consulting shortly on proposals for boundary changes to the traffic areas so as to achieve a more even distribution of work.

London Transport Fares

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on fares charged by London Transport. [30627]

Mr. Norris: The general level and structure of London Transport fares are the statutory responsibility of LT. However, as our document "A Transport Strategy for London" indicates, we believe that, in future, LT fares are likely to rise more in line with inflation than with earnings, implying average fare increases lower than in recent years.

Bull Bars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many letters and submissions he has received supporting the Bull Bars (Prohibition) Bill; and how many have opposed it. [32092]

Mr. Norris: The Department has received 197 letters and submissions supporting the Bull Bars (Prohibition) Bill and 10 opposing it.

Thames Piers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what submissions he has received from the Port of London Authority to comply with the recommendation of the River Thames working group to review the location and availability of piers on the Thames. [31475]

Mr. Norris: The Port of London Authority is working with the Cross River Partnership to examine in detail the location of, and potential demand for, existing and possible new piers in central London. This study forms part of the cross-river integrated public transport study which is expected to report next year.

In addition, the PLA has recently completed a review of the availability of space at the existing piers under its control, in response to a number of proposals to start new passenger services, and last week invited bids for the use of the available space.

Proposals are anticipated in due course for new piers and the upgrading of existing piers. The Government welcome such initiatives which, if implemented, would increase the total pier capacity in central London and facilitate increase use of the Thames for passenger transport.

Ferry Safety

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the evacuation time of all passengers and crew that can be required of all ferries using British ports licensed to carry more than 1,000 passengers. [32094]

Mr. Norris: The precise time taken to evacuate any such ship would depend upon individual circumstances. Under the safety of life at sea convention, all survival craft needs for the abandonment of the ship must be able to be launched fully loaded within 30 minutes from the time the abandon ship signal is given.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what use her Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; which agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to her Department. [30573]

Mr. Sproat: My Department has made no use of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 or 1994–95.

Of my two agencies, the Historic Royal Palaces agency used the services of private detectives on one occasion during 1995–96 and the Royal Parks agency used a private investigator for one inquiry during 1995–96.

As both these inquiries were of a confidential personnel-related nature, it would be wrong to provide more specific information.

National Lottery

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many organisations have been awarded funds from the national lottery five good causes; what is the total amount in pounds; and how much of that money in percentage terms from each of the five good causes has not yet been paid out to these organisations. [28143]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about lottery awards is collected on the basis of awards and projects rather than on the basis of recipient organisations. At 2 May 1996, 5,498 awards for 6,588 projects totalling £1,484,691,164.76 had been made by the 11 lottery distributing bodies throughout the United Kingdom.

It is a general principle in the distribution of lottery funds that cash will be paid out only to an award recipient on receipt of an invoice relating to the lottery-funded project, consistent with the prudent management of public funds. Until that time, the funds allocated and committed to the future costs of projects remain invested in the national lottery distribution fund, where all the investment returns earned accrue to the good causes.

It is therefore important to distinguish between the commitment of funds to awards and the draw-down of cash from the NLDF. The figures for awards include a significant proportion of projects which have not yet drawn down from the NLDF, either because the award is very recent, or because the project has not yet met all the particular conditions placed on the award. They also include the total value of awards to over 4,000 capital projects whose expenditure is spread out over many years to come.

My Department ensures that the future commitment of funds by the lottery distributing bodies remains within prudent levels consistent with their share of the expected income to the NLDF.

The figures for each of the five good causes for funds allocated from the NLDF at 31 March 1996 are shown in the table:

	Lottery receipts £ million	Amount awarded (including future commitments £ million	Amount drawn down £ million	Percentage of amount awarded awaiting draw down from NLDF
Arts	363	403	35	90
Sports	363	254	29	92
Heritage	363	173	36	90
Millennium	363	494	5	99
Charities	363	159	19	95

National Vocational Qualifications

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what sums of public money (a) have been spent and (b) are allocated to the national coaching foundation scheme for Scottish and national vocational qualifications for coaching. [30327]

Mr. Sproat: The Sports Council will provide £1,500,500 grant aid to the National Coaching Foundation in 1996–97 for a work programme which will include assistance to the national governing bodies of sport to help them develop their coach education programmes. A total of £183,000 is to be allocated to work on the Scottish/national vocational qualifications—S/NVO. This will involve assisting the governing bodies of sport to convert their existing coach award schemes in line with S/NVQ standards. For the last three years, the corresponding figures for Sports Council grant to the NCF have been:

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Total grant	1,494,000	1,420,000	1,550,500
S/NVQ element	164,000	153,661	176,136

I understand that funds are also made available by the Further Education Funding Council.

Roman Road

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the extent of the surviving Roman road on the site of the HAT redevelopment of the Lefevre Walk estate on the Parnell road, Old Ford site; and what measures are planned to ensure that the surviving Roman road remains (a) undisturbed and (b) accessible for further investigation. [31308]

Mr. Sproat: Archaeological remains, including a small part of the Roman road which extended from London to Colchester, exist at the Lefevre Walk estate redevelopment site and have been properly investigated in accordance with English Heritage's advice. As recommended in Government guidance on archaeology and planning, a condition has been included in the planning permission given by the London borough of Tower Hamlets to ensure that the foundations for the new housing development will have as little impact as possible on these remains.

Euro 96

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what emergency accommodation arrangements local authorities are providing for fans attending the Euro 96 football championships; what is the estimated cost involved in making these arrangements; and who is meeting the cost of this accommodation. [31328]

Mr. Sproat: I understand that local authorities have been examining ways of meeting accommodation needs for fans attending Euro 96. The costs involved are a matter for the local authorities themselves.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much her Department spent in recruiting staff to her Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruitment in each of these years. [31403]

Mr. Sproat: My Department and its agencies spent £101,793.05 on recruiting 60 staff during the financial year 1994–95. During 1995–96, we spent £136,449.75 recruiting 57 staff.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what use her Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within her Department or executive agencies administered by her Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts; [31418]

(2) in what circumstances her Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within her own Department or its executive agencies. [31531]

Mr. Sproat: Neither this Department nor its executive agencies have used executive search agencies or employment companies to fill any vacancies during the financial years 1994–95 or 1995–96. Therefore, the question of whether we use executive search agencies or employment companies in preference to using personnel staff is not applicable.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) pursuant to her answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 518, how much her Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31459]

(2) pursuant to her answer of 28 March, Official Report, column 724, how much her Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31452]

Mr. Sproat: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what measures her Department has implemented during the last 12 months to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with her Department and its executive agencies; and what progress her Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31533]

Mr. Sproat: Since the Department was created in April 1992, promotees into senior positions in the Department of National Heritage and its agencies have been selected on merit on the basis of fair and open competition. The Department is committed, through the departmental equal opportunities policy statement and action plan, to monitor the progress of women at key stages in their career development, and to take any action appropriate to remove any significant barriers to career progress.

The agencies abide by the principles set out in the policy statement and action plan. The Department has been developing non-discriminatory personnel practices, and procedures including flexible working arrangements, child care provision for employees, and appraisal and promotion systems, which are fair, and do not discriminate against a particular group. As a result of these, the Department and agencies have a good record in respect of the employment and promotion of women.

British Academy of Sport

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to her answer of 10 May, Official Report, column 294, about the British Academy of Sport (1) what factors led to her inability to provide the information requested; [31585]

(2) when she expects to be able to provide the information requested. [31584]

Mr. Sproat: The detailed analysis of the consultation exercise is an internal document, never itself intended for publication. It is the basis of internal discussion and advice on a policy which has yet to be finalised and announced. The selective release of some elements of the information from the exercise would be misleading. It would also be premature, given that I have said in my previous parliamentary answer that a summary of the main conclusions of the consultation exercise will be published along with the bid prospectus.

Museums and Coal Mining

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps she is taking to implement the recommendations in the Museums and Galleries Commission report on museums and coal mining. [31635]

Mr. Sproat: The report on museums and coal mining has been prepared by an independent consultant for the Museums and Galleries Commission. The commission is currently considering the recommendations in the report. If, following that consideration, the commission wishes to raise any specific aspects of the report with the Government, my Department will be prepared to consider these, in consultation with the Scottish Office and the Welsh Office.

Royal Fine Art Commission

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement regarding Sir Geoffrey Chipperfield's report into the royal fine art commission. [31573]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer Friday 7 June 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 9 May 1996, Official Report, columns 213–14.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kashmir (Elections)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the electorate in all Kashmir constituencies voted in the recent national elections; how many United Kingdom nationals observed those elections on behalf of Her Majesty's Government; if he will arrange to place their report in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [31420]

Mr. Hanley: Official Indian election commission figures for the voting in the recent elections in Kashmir are as follows: Jammu 49.1 per cent., Ladakh 83.3 per cent., Anantnag 39 per cent., Baramulla 46.6 per cent., Srinagar 41 per cent. and Udhampur 52 per cent. A member of our high commission in New Delhi visited the Kashmir constituencies during the elections. The high commission's reports on those visits are internal documents and will not be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 386, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31447]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 29 March, Official Report, column 796, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31450]

Mr. Hanley: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31392]

Mr. Hanley: The cost of recruiting permanent staff to this Department and its agencies, and the numbers in each period were:

	1994–95	1995–96
Cost (£)	996,806	962,711
Number	253	188

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31407]

Mr. Hanley: This Department and its agencies have not used executive search agencies during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96, but have used the following employment companies:

2 Heads better for business

	1994–95	1995–96
Number of staff recruited	46	66
Cost	£48,167	£51,177

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31520]

Mr. Hanley: This Department and its agencies use employment agencies to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff since it represents best value for money.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures her Department has implemented during the last 12 months to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with his Department and its executive agencies; and what progress her Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31544]

Mr. Hanley: We have an action programme in place to ensure equality of access to recruitment, training, career development and promotion for all women. Graduate recruitment into the fast stream is particularly targeted to help redress the under-representation of women at senior levels. The policy is seeing results—in 1995, 57 per cent. of the fast stream intake were women. We encourage the retention of women through a number of initiatives including flexible/part-time work, generous career breaks, subsidised nursery facilities and holiday play schemes for school children. We have been an active member of the Opportunity 2000 campaign since 1992.

We are seeing a steady increase in the percentage of women at all levels in the FCO. The number of women at DS5—top level of middle management—has increased from 9.6 per cent. in 1991 to 13.7 per cent. in 1995. The number of women in the top three grades of the DS has increased by 1 per cent. in 1995 to 3.7 per cent. in 1991, a level that has been maintained to date. There are now eight female ambassadors/heads of mission compared to two in 1991.

Chazanfer Ali

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received about the detention in Mirpur prison of Chazanfer Ali; and if he will make a statement. [31421]

Mr. Hanley: Our high commission in Islamabad was told on 6 June by the Mirpur prison authorities that Chazanfer Ali, a Pakistani national, is still making regular court appearances and that he is in good health.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration has been given to market testing the services provided by his Department's agencies; and if he will make a statement. [31558]

Mr. Hanley: A prior options review of the diplomatic wing's executive agency, Wilton Park, took place in 1995. The study recommend that the commercial—that is, non-conference—operation be market tested by November 1997. This would not affect Wilton Park's core business of organising conferences on foreign policy matters. This has been endorsed by Ministers.

The ODA's agency—the Natural Resources Institute—has recently been transferred to private ownership.

European Court of Justice

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many judgments were given against each of the member countries in the European Union by the European Court of Justice in each year since 1989; [31607]

(2) on how many occasions each of the member countries in the European Union were taken to the European Court of Justice in each year since 1989. [31619]

Mr. David Davis: The most up-to-date information is in annexe II of the 12th annual report on monitoring the applications of Community law, OJC No. 254, 1994. The data for 1989 are in annexe II of the 11th report, OJC No. 154, 1993. The 13th report will be published shortly. The reports are in the Library of the House. They summarise the progress of all infraction proceedings against member states.

Seal Pups

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the numbers of harp and hooded seal pups taken in the region of the White sea in 1996 to date. [31832]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: None. The question of seal culling in the White sea was last raised with the Russian Environment Ministry by our embassy in Moscow in December 1995.

The embassy in Moscow has been instructed to ask for an update on the latest position and I shall write to the hon. Member in due course.

Embassies and Missions (Running Costs)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the total costs of staffing and running embassies and missions in (a) Vilnius, (b) Riga and (c) Talinn (d) Paris and (e) Rome in each of the past three years. [32212]

Mr. Hanley: The information is in the following table:

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
Vilnius	213,196	267,328	267,481
Riga	663,185	698,407	450,518
Talinn	243,013	210,379	239,960
Paris	12,522,331	12,577,264	12,582,954
Rome	6,220,557	6,192,928	5,893,770

African Nuclear Weapons Free Zone

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's recent signature to the African nuclear weapons free zone treaty; and what restrictions the treaty places on the use of nuclear weapons against an African party to that treaty which has used other weapons of mass destruction. [32050]

Mr. David Davis: The UK signed, subject to ratification protocols 1 and 2 to the African nuclear weapons free zone treaty on 11 April. Parties to protocol 1 undertake not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against parties to the treaty. On signature, we stated that we would not be bound by this undertaking if a state party to the treaty attacked us in alliance with a nuclear weapon state, or was in breach of its own non-proliferation obligations under the treaty. Our statement also noted that compliance with international agreements to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is vital to the maintenance of world security.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Attorney-General what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31498]

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) on 6 June 1996, Official Report, column 518.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Drug Abuse

34. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council what evidence he has evaluated that suggests that the taking of soft drugs leads to the taking of hard drugs; and if he will make a statement. [30637]

Mr. Newton: The Government have neither commissioned nor evaluated evidence on this specific point as we do not find the distinction between so-called hard and soft drugs helpful: all illegal drugs carry physical and mental health risks.

36. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on measures to combat drug abuse. [30639]

Mr. Newton: The Government's drugs strategy for England for the period 1995–98, "Tackling Drugs Together", was published on 10 May 1995. In answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) on 13 May, Official Report, columns 341–42, I described the considerable progress made in implementing the strategy during its first year, and on 14 May I wrote to all hon. Members in England outlining the work of drug action teams. Similar strategies are in place in the other parts of the United Kingdom.

38. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Lord President of the Council what progress he had made in ensuring provision of resources for drug rehabilitation. [30641]

Mr. Newton: The Government's policy is to ensure that individual drug misusers have access to a range of advice, counselling, treatment, rehabilitation and after-care services. The independent task force set up to undertake a review of effective treatment services for drug misusers has reported to Ministers and its report was published on 1 May. Guidance to purchasers will be issued in the summer. Additional resources are being made available this year to boost drug treatment services: an extra £6 million will go to health authorities, and £5.1 million will be invested in treatment programmes in the Prison Service.

Health Strategy

35. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is his role in the co-ordination of health strategy. [30638]

Mr. Newton: I chair the Ministerial Sub-committee on Health Strategy. The sub-committee's purpose is to oversee the development, implementation and monitoring of the Government's health strategy, and to co-ordinate the Government's policies on United Kingdom-wide issues affecting health.

Drug Trafficking

37. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Lord President of the Council what assessment the group he chairs on tackling drugs has made of drug trafficking via Holland. [30640]

Mr. Newton: The Ministerial Sub-committee of the Cabinet on the misuse of drugs, which I chair, has the task of co-ordinating the Government's national and international policies for tackling drug misuse, and reporting as necessary to the Ministerial Committee on Home and Social Affairs. As part of its remit, the sub-committee makes periodic assessments of drug trafficking patterns and of the arrangements in place to combat them.

Summer Recess

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Lord President of the Council what consideration he has given to sittings of the House in September; and if he will make a statement. [30634]

Mr. Newton: I cannot yet give the House the proposed dates for the summer adjournment, but I have no plans to make any radical departure from recent practice.

Parliamentary Procedures.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Lord President of the Council what changes he proposes to simplify parliamentary procedures. [30636]

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the oral answer I gave him on 22 April, Official Report, column 18.

DEFENCE

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purpose; and at what cost to his Department. [30567]

Mr. Soames: I am aware of only one case where my Department made direct use of the services of a private detective agency or investigator during 1994–95 and 1995–96. This was in respect of a claim for compensation, at a cost of less than £2,000. I understand that solicitors, and an insurance company working for my Department, may sometimes employ inquiry agents when pursuing debtors and in connection with cases involving claims for compensation. While such services are not paid for directly, they may be included in final costs submitted to my Department.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 441, how much his Department estimated it would have to cost to provide the information requested. [31463]

Mr. Soames: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Unidentified Objects (Rendlesham Forest)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 7 May, Official Report, columns 19–20, if he will list the titles of the papers held by his Department in respect of unidentified objects seen in Rendlesham forest, Suffolk; and if he will make a statement. [31490]

Mr. Soames: Apart from a report of the events written at the time by the United States air force deputy base commander at RAF Woodbridge, which has been in the public domain for a number of years, the documents held by my Department are internal staffing papers and correspondence from members of the public relating to the alleged events.

Bourlon Barracks, Catterick

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of the structure and fixed equipment of building 36 at Bourlon barracks, Catterick, for the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers light aid detachment; and if the final payment for that building has been made by his Department. [31612]

Mr. Soames: The total cost of the structure and fixed equipment of building 36, Bourlon barracks, REME LAD, was £524,179. The final payment for this building—that is, the release of retention—has not been made.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the cost of modifications to the crane, doors and exhaust ventilation system in the LAD building (No. 36) at Bourlon barracks, Catterick, to facilitate maintenance work on Warrior armoured personnel carriers. [31614]

Mr. Soames: The estimated cost for the modification of the crane from a single to a two-speed motor is £5,500. There are no plans to modify any of the doors in building 36. The exhaust extraction system was modified in January 1996 at an approximate cost of £2,500.

Sea Training

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which operational sea training facilities the United Kingdom will make available to the Western European Union, following the Birmingham declaration of 7 May. [31746]

Mr. Soames: We will make available, for national or collective participation by WEU nations, the Royal Navy's operational sea training facility at Plymouth, and the joint maritime courses which are run off the coast of Scotland.

Western European Union

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to develop further the Western European Union's intelligence section. [31750]

Mr. Soames: The intelligence section agreed by Ministers in 1995 is not operational. Any further development of its capabilities would be undertaken by WEU in the light of experience.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with the Western European Union mobility study following the Western European Union Ministerial Council meeting in Birmingham and the meeting of Western European Union Chiefs of Defence Staff in London. [31752]

Mr. Soames: Following endorsement of the strategic mobility concept by Chiefs of Defence Staff and by Ministers, a special WEU working group has begun examining the most effective means by which the concept might be implemented.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made as to when the Western European Union will be in a position to conduct a full-scale Petersberg-type operation. [31747]

Mr. Soames: Our target is for the WEU to be capable of conducting a small-scale crisis management mission by the end of 1996. Achievement of this goal depends on the WEU making further progress on the operational improvements we have initiated during our presidency.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which countries have not to date offered to provide intelligence data to the Western European Union's intelligence section. [31751]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the nations concerned.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures will be taken to increase the involvement of the associate partner members in Western European Union's work on operational development with particular reference to Africa peacekeeping, exercise policy and humanitarian task force operations. [31749]

Mr. Soames: WEU associate partners have already taken part in discussions on the specific issues referred to by the hon. Member. They have also been invited to provide information on the forces that they might make available for WEU operations. We look forward to their further involvement in discussions on other operational matters.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will encourage the Western European Union to add a public relations element to its current crisis exercises, Crisex 96. [31753]

Mr. Soames: The WEU intends to use this exercise to promote its operational role to the media, and plans a press visit to the exercise. The WEU will also be testing internally new procedures for operational public information policy, developed as a UK initiative.

Sea Harrier Aircraft

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Sea Harrier aircraft have been lost in the last year; how many new aircraft from the attrition batch whose procurement was announced in January 1994 have now been deployed in squadron service as replacements; and what navigation system was fitted to those replacement aircraft when they were delivered by British Aerospace. [31758]

Mr. Soames: In the year since 1 June 1995, there have been two major accidents involving Royal Navy Sea Harrier FA2 aircraft. The first was on 20 October, when an aircraft caught fire while preparing to take off from Royal Naval Auxiliary Service, Yeovilton; and the second on 13 February when an aircraft ditched into the Adriatic. Additionally, a Royal Navy Harrier T4 crashed near Wellington, Somerset on 23 February, tragically killing the two personnel on board.

Four Sea Harrier aircraft from the attrition batch whose procurement was announced in January 1994 have been deployed in squadron service. A further aircraft is currently in the maintenance group and will be delivered to a front-line squadron shortly. The replacement aircraft delivered by British Aerospace were fitted with the Navigation heading and attitudes reference system.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the cost to his Department of procuring new navigation systems for Sea Harrier aircraft; and what share of the value of that contract will be passed on to British Aerospace. [31757]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The total cost to my Department of procuring new navigation systems for the Sea Harrier aircraft is estimated to be in the order of £35 million at current prices inclusive of VAT. This includes the costs of equipment, its integration into the aircraft and flight trials to ensure system safety and airworthiness. It is not possible at this stage to quantify the precise value of the British Aerospace element of the programme because contract negotiations have not yet been concluded. Contract price values are, in any case, usually commercially confidential.

Torrejon Satellite Centre

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans the United Kingdom has to explore possible links between the Western European Union satellite centre in Torrejon and the Pentagon before the end of its presidency of the Western European Union. [31748]

Mr. Soames: The UK has no plans to explore such links.

Exports Licensing

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the impact on the current defence exports licensing policy of the recent agreement to join the Franco-German Arms Agency. [31986]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Exports licensing policy is the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Industry. However, there are no plans to change UK export licensing policy in the context of participation in the Franco-German armaments structure.

Trident D5 Missiles

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he expects to place an order for further Trident D5 missiles from the United States of America before the summer adjournment. [32052]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Orders for Trident D5 missiles are placed on behalf of my Department by the United States Department of Defence. The next tranche of orders will not be placed before the start of the US fiscal year 1997, which commences on 1 October this year.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons HMS Victorious is deployed with less than its full complement of Trident D5 missiles. [32054]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement gave to the hon. Member for the Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) on 18 January 1994, Official Report, column 505.

Bett Review

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he now expects to make a statement on the outcome of Sir Michael Bett's review of conditions of service, including pension arrangements, in the armed forces. [32090]

Mr. Soames: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) on 20 February 1996, Official Report, columns 96–97.

Menwith Hill Station

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date he received a document entitled "Outbrief-Environmental Compliance Status Survey, Menwith Hill Station"; what action he took upon receipt of this document; if he will place a copy in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [31954]

Mr. Soames: The document referred to is an internal US report dating from 1992. Remedial action has been taken by the station in accordance with its recommendations and a rolling programme of improvements is underway. The document is for US official use only and as such will not be made available for public dissemination.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what records are maintained concerning the disposal of hazardous waste from RAF Menwith Hill; how and where such hazardous waste from RAF Menwith Hill; how and where such hazardous waste is disposed of; and if he will make a statement. [31958]

Mr. Soames: Records concerning the disposal of hazardous waste are maintained in accordance with US and UK legislative requirements. Hazardous waste is disposed of by licensed specialist contractors.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action has been taken to ensure that the containment dykes for above-ground storage tanks at RAF Menwith Hill are sufficiently secure to ensure that no spilt material can escape; and what action is being taken to improve the health and safety standards in the storage and labelling of hazardous material, with particular reference to chlorofluorocarbons at RAF Menwith Hill. [31956]

Mr. Soames: The station continues to pay close attention to the containment facilities which are regularly inspected in order to verify their integrity and avoid spillages. The handling of hazardous materials at RAF Menwith Hill has improved and a project is under way to build a permanent segregated compound for the storage of these materials. A control of substances hazardous to health assessment of all chemicals is undertaken when materials arrive on site in order to ensure that proper labelling and user instructions exists. A staff hazard education programme has also been implemented. Significant progress has been made in the last four years limiting the use of CFCS and other class 1 substances in accordance with the requirements of the Montreal protocol and management of these substances now conforms to agreed international standards.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what systems are in place to monitor levels of radiation at RAF Menwith Hill; who is responsible for such monitoring; if their reports are made available to the public; and what precautions and preventative measures are being taken to protect the health and safety of the base population, the local community and local environment from the effects of radiation emitted by operations at RAF Menwith Hill. [31953]

Mr. Soames: No monitoring systems are required since there are no ionising radiation emissions from any facility at RAF Menwith Hill. Radio frequency signals similar to those used in FM radio broadcasting are relayed through the station, but these signals have a very low energy level and do not cause molecular changes or "ionisation". Hence there is no risk to the base population, the local community or the local environment from emissions of this type of radiation.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions and arrangements are taking place concerning the renewal of the security of tenure in May 1977 at National Security Agency, Menwith Hill station between the US army and the British Government; and if the renewal arrangements will be brought before the House. [31957]

Mr. Soames: None. The site at Menwith Hill has been made available to United States authorities by Her Majesty's Government under arrangements that exist for our mutual defence. The precise nature of these arrangements are confidential.

Suicides

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, columns 559–60, how many people who served in the Gulf war have committed suicide since 1991. [31789]

Mr. Soames: Since January 1991, the total number of personnel who served in the Gulf war and subsequently committed suicide, while still serving in the armed forces, is 10.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 559, what was (a) the nationality of owners, (b) the nationality of crew and (c) the age of vessel of each of the merchant ships chartered by his Department for Exercise Purple Star. Mr. Soames: The information requested is published annually in table 3.5 in "UK Defence Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the average time a patient in an accident and emergency unit has to wait before treatment in London hospitals, by local authority. [31324]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available centrally.

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis need is assessed in accident and emergency units in London; and what system of prioritisation is employed. [31325]

Mr. Horam: Under the patients charter, all patients attending an accident and emergency department should be assessed by a nurse or doctor within five minutes. Patients are then treated according to their clinical priority.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31504]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Minister for Boothferry (Mr. Davis), gave him on 6 June, Official Report, column 518.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995-96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31398]

Mr. Horam: During 1994–95, the Department of Health and its agencies spent £233,482 recruiting 123 staff. Expenditure for 1995–96 was £707,292 when 265 staff were recruited.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31413]

Mr. Horam: In 1994–95 and 1995–96, the following executive search agencies or employment companies were used by Department of Health and its executive agencies to recruit staff:

Doncaster Health Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has had from the chairman of the Doncaster Royal Infirmary and Mexborough Montagu NHS trust concerning the level of management overheads and the need for further economies at (a) management and (b) staff level; and when he expects to receive a report on the future shape of the trust. [31434]

Mr. Malone: We have received no such representations from the chairman of the Doncaster Royal Infirmary and Mexborough Montagu national health service trust and no report is expected.

Community Health Councils

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will require community health councils to publish annually a list of achievements they have made on behalf of those they represent; [31742]

(2) what is the annual cost of community health councils; [31744]

(3) what assessment his Department has made of the usefulness of community health councils; and what plans he has to introduce changes to their role. [31745]

Mr. Horam: Community health councils were established by Parliament to represent the public interest in the health service in their districts. There are no plans to introduce changes to this statutory role.

Community health councils are required to publish an annual report on the performance of their functions and to ensure that the contents of the report are known to the public.

Expenditure on community health councils in 1995–96 was £17 million. The budget for CHCs for 1996–97 is £21.18 million.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department has taken to inform the public that they may take complaints about health matters to their community health council. [31743]

Mr. Horam: Complaints about health services should be directed to the body which provided that service, for example a national health service trust or general practitioner practice.

A public information leaflet was produced by the Department on the new NHS complaints procedure which was introduced from 1 April this year. This mentions the important role community health councils can play in advising members of the public when they wish to complain about NHS services or treatment. Supplies of the leaflet were sent to all NHS outlets.

GP Fundholding

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will order the publication of the Audit Commission report on the performance of fundholding general practices; and for what reasons the report has not yet been published. [32091]

Mr. Malone: The publication of Audit Commission reports is the responsibility of the commission. Its report, "A study of GP Fundholders in England and Wales", was published on 22 May 1996.

Coffee (Health Implications)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his most recent assessment of the health implications of drinking coffee; and if he will make a statement. [32093]

Mr. Horam: In November 1994, the Department published the report of the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Food Policy on the nutritional aspects of cardiovascular disease. Its assessment was that coffee as drunk in the United Kingdom does not appear to affect coronary heart disease risk. A copy of that report is available in the Library.

The Department of Health's Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment last considered caffeine in 1983–94. COT concluded that, on the basis of the evidence available at that time, the consumption of caffeine either as an additive or naturally occurring in beverages would not cause any risk to health.

Bradford Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent reports he has evaluated into the standard of care in Bradford NHS trust hospitals; and what action he proposes to take in respect of these reports. [32103]

Mr. Horam: I have received no such reports. This is a matter for the Bradford Hospitals national health service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact the acting chairman of the trust, Mr. Richard Wilson, for details.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what instructions were issued to her Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31503]

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis), on 6 June, Official Report, column 518.

School Funding

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding is provided by her Department to assist (a) local education authority maintained and (b) grant-maintained schools which have recently been inspected by the Office for Standards in Education; and, in each case, what requirements exist over how this may be spent. [31835]

Mr. Robin Squire: In respect of (a), in addition to school effectiveness grants paid to all schools, and grants retained by local education authorities targeted especially towards the weakest schools, the Government have now introduced a new grant payable to all LEA-maintained schools inspected by Ofsted in the 1995–96 academic year. The grant typically amounts to some £17 per pupil. Schools are able to use the grant to address the key issues for action identified in the inspector's report. The intention is that, subject to Parliament's approval of the necessary regulations, grant will be available to support schools inspected in future years.

In respect of (b), for grant-maintained schools, grants for education support and training activities are supported through the payment of a special purpose grant (development). The calculation and payment of special purpose grants is now the responsibility of the Funding Agency for Schools and I have asked the chairman of the Funding Agency for Schools to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if, under regulations issued by her Department, the local education authority contribution to grant for education support and training funding is included in the calculation of the relevant expenditure by a local education authority for the purposes of determining the level of central annual maintenance grant for grant-maintained schools. [31840]

Mr. Squire: Yes.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what regulations or guidance she has issued in accordance with which the Funding Agency for Schools determines the current level of funding per pupil to grant-maintained schools through special purpose grant (development) and the conditions applied to its expenditure by the schools regarding the purposes for which it may be spent. [31842]

Mr. Squire: The level of special purpose grant (development) is a matter for the Funding Agency for Schools. The powers of the agency to pay special purpose grants to grant-maintained schools are set out in paragraph 54 of, and schedule 7 to, the Education (Grant-maintained and Grant-maintained Special Schools) (Finance) Regulations 1996.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the current level of expenditure on grants for education support and training in local education authorities and local education authority maintained schools; what is the total number of pupils in local education authority maintained schools; how much of the total expenditure on GEST in the current year is provided by (i) her Department and (ii) local education authorities; what proportion of GEST expenditure (1) must be delegated to schools and (2) cannot be delegated to schools; and what conditions are applied to the expenditure of GEST funding regarding the purpose for which it may be spent. [31841]

Mr. Squire: In 1996–97, level of expenditure available to local education authorities under grants for education support and training will be £265.3 million. The total number of pupils in local education authority-maintained schools in England is 6,617,851, as at January 1995, the latest figure available. The total amount of expenditure on GEST in 1996–97 provided (i) by the Department of Education and Employment will be £163.5 million; and (ii) by the local education authorities will be £101.8 million. The proportion of GEST expenditure that must be devolved to schools is £153.5 million and the proportion that must not be devolved is £13.2 million. The purpose for which GEST may be spent is outlined in GEST circular 8/95 and subsequent letters to local education authorities. Copies of the circular and letters have been placed in the Library.

Local Authority Capital Receipts

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in respect of which educational assets he proposes to allow local authorities to sell and retain 75 per cent. of the capital receipts. [31755]

Mr. Robin Squire: It is for local authorities to determine whether to take advantage of the reduction from 50 per cent. to 25 per cent. in the level of capital receipts to be set aside for debt redemption from sales of surplus educational assets obtained between 1 April 1996 and 31 March 1998. This reduction is intended primarily to facilitate and encourage private finance initiative activity in local government.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures her Department has implemented during the last 12 months to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with her Department and its executive agencies; and what progress her Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31555]

Mr. Robin Squire: Both former Departments had made significant progress in appointing women to senior posts. Since the merger on 5 July 1995, there has been wide consultation within DFEE on a set of values and an Equal opportunities strategy. The departmental values, among other things, stress the importance of valuing people and "giving people equal opportunities to develop and progress as far as they can on merit".

The Department's equal opportunities strategy undertakes as one of its key priorities to look at strategies to enable women to progress on merit to senior posts. This includes reconstituting an advisory group for women — taking forward work previously under way before merger— with a specific remit to advise the DFEE board on strategic issues and on cultural barriers which can prevent women from reaching the most senior levels.

At present, 18 per cent. of the members of the senior civil service in DFEE are women. However, data prior to July 1995 relate to the former Employment Department group and the former Department for education and are not comparable.

Small Firms (Training Needs)

Mr. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what work has been commissioned by her Department on the training needs of small firms; and what recommendations have been made. [31890]

Mr. Paice: In 1995, the Department for Education and Employment commissioned the small business research centre at Kingston university to carry out a survey of training needs and practices in over 800 small firms. A report containing a range of recommendations for the Department to consider will be published by HMSO in August 1996 and a copy will be lodged in the Library.

Stephen Memorial First School, North Tyneside

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she will take to ensure the provision of a new school building for Stephenson Memorial first school, North Tyneside; and if she will make a statement. [32157]

Mrs. Gillan: North Tyneside education authority is responsible for maintaining its school buildings and deciding when any of them should be replaced.

Learning Vouchers

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to introduce learning vouchers or credits for 16-year-olds; and what funding mechanism is to be used. [32155]

Mr. Paice: The 1995 White Paper "Competitiveness: Forging Ahead", Cm 2867, made it clear that the Government are attracted to learning credits. The third competitiveness White Paper, to be published shortly, will declare the Government's intention to consult on the introduction from 1997 of a system of learning credits, setting out for all 16 to 19-year-olds their entitlement to the education or training they choose. This will not require any change to the existing funding mechanisms for schools, colleges or other education and training providers. But the Government will separately be consulting on how best to secure greater convergence of these arrangements in their own right.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many organisations are approved to verify and assess NVQ portfolios and issue NVQ certificates. [32156]

Mr. Paice: There are currently 63 organisations, acting individually and in consortiums, accredited by the National Council for Vocational Qualifications to award national vocational qualification certificates. These accredited awarding bodies offer assessment through their approved NVQ centres, of which there are around 9,500 nationally.

WALES

Over-16 Education

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the average cost of educating a child for (a) one year and (b) two years in school above the age of 16. [31353]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Local education authority returns to the Welsh Office used to calculate pupil unit cost figures do not separately identify expenditure by age of pupil. As a consequence, no estimates are available on the average cost of educating a pupil aged 16 and above.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of 16-year-old children in each county who returned to school for one year left with (a) an additional qualification, (b) an improved grade at GCSE and (c) an alternative qualification. [31355]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the sum received by schools for each child who returns to school after the age of 16 years; and on what basis and by what calculations such sums are made and paid. [31357]

Mr. Evans: No estimates of such sums are made. Local education authorities are responsible for the allocation of funds to schools.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of 16-year-olds in each county who returned to school for two years, left school without (i) an A-level (a) above grade C and (b) above grade E and (ii) an equivalent qualification. [31354]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not collected centrally in the format requested.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of 16-year-olds returned to school for (a) one year, (b) two years and (c) three years in each county during the last school year. [31356]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not collected centrally. Overall, in 1994–95 39.3 per cent. of 16-year-olds at maintained schools in Wales in the previous academic year returned to school.

Youth Training

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the percentage completion rates for youth training (a) in each of the training and enterprise council areas and for (b) Wales. [31359]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The figures requested are contained in the following table. They relate to the period April 1994 to March 1995, the last full year for which data are available.

Cattle Slaughter

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action his Department is taking to ensure that cattle carcases submitted under the 30-month rule are subsequently destroyed; and what information he has about the number of carcases of such cattle which have either been disposed of by other means or are otherwise unaccounted for. [31580]

Mr. Hague: The over-30-month slaughter scheme is run by the Intervention Board executive agency. I understand that following slaughter carcases are stained and transported in sealed containers to renderers or for cold storage before rendering. The process is carefully monitored by the Meat Hygiene Service and state veterinary service and there are no carcases unaccounted for.

Fishery Projects Funding

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much Pesca funding is available for fishery projects in Wales for 1996–97; how much was paid in 1995–96; and if he will list those projects funded and the amount each project received. [32161]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Pesca scheme will be launched in Wales at the end of this month. Some 0.146 mecu—approximately £125,000—Pesca funding will be available for Welsh fishery projects for 1996–97.

Sea Empress Oil Spill

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what request for long-term funding he has received from the Sea Empress environmental evaluation committee; [31996]

(2) what funding he has allocated to the Sea Empress environmental evaluation committee; how much has been committed to date; and what is the committee's estimate of the funding required to complete its work. [31998]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My right hon. Friend has provided £250,000 to the Countryside Council for Wales to help fund the work into the environmental effects of the Sea Empress oil spill. The Department of Transport is meeting the running costs of the Sea Empress environmental evaluation committee, and direct support for the work of the committee is being provided by MAFF and the Environment Agency. I am expecting proposals soon on the future work programme of the committee and its resource needs.

General Practitioners (Training)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many general practitioner trainees were on vocational training schemes in Wales in each year since 1990–91. [31997]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the number of general practitioner trainees on vocational training schemes in hospital is not available centrally. However, the number of trainees who were in training with general practitioners in each of the last six years is given in the following table:

Number of trainees in training with general medical practitioners at 1 October

1990: 148

1991: 138

1992: 133

1993: 124

1994: 118

1995: 104.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years; [31399]

(2) what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31414]

Mr. Burt: The information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY

State Pensions

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the (a) gross and (b) net cost in each year from 1997 to 2002 of uprating state pensions by (i) the retail prices index and (ii) earnings in these years on the basis of current estimates. [30153]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the table:

The estimates are for uprating basic state retirement pension, additional pension and graduated retirement benefit. The calculations are based on assumptions of annual retail prices index and Rossi index—RPI less most housing costs—increases of 2.5 per cent. and annual earnings increases of 4 per cent. As RPI and Rossi are assumed to increase at the same rate, there is no net cost figure for price uprating.

Total state pension benefit expenditure

£ million cash prices

	Gross cost of price uprating	Gross cost of uprating by earnings	Net cost of earnings uprating
1997–98	840	1,350	1,220
1998–99	1,740	2,820	2,530
1999–00	2,680	4,380	3,920
2000–01	3,650	6,010	5,370

Notes:
1. Costs are calculated using 1996–97 rates as a baseline, eg; the cost quoted for 2002–03 is the cost of uprating by the relevant method, in that year, from 1996–97.
2. Uprating by higher of earnings or prices only applied to basic retirement pension.

Motability Finance Ltd.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the value of the reserves held by Motability Finance Ltd. to safeguard its lease and hire purchase schemes. [30239]

Mr. Burt: The value of reserves held by Motability Finance Ltd. at September 1994 was £4.8 million.

Source:
Motability's annual report 1994–95.

Bronchitis and Emphysema

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will implement in full the recommendations of the report of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council on chronic bronchitis and emphysema; what timetable he proposes for the Government's response; and if he will make a statement. [31481]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) on 21 May, Official Report, column 185.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 3 April, Official Report, column 345, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31442]

Mr. Burt: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Departmental Software

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's involvement in the development of a software package to allow pay-as-you-earn, national insurance contributions, value added tax, and Central Statistical Office requirements to be integrated; and when he expects this to be possible. [31903]

Mr. Heald: The Contributions Agency, Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise have a number of projects under way as part of their joint working programmes. The programmes are focused in particular on ways to ease burdens on business in meeting their obligations, but there are no plans to integrate the information technology systems.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many cases have been dealt with by the Newbury field office of the Child Support Agency since 1 June 1995; [31780]

(2) what geographical area is covered by the Newbury field office of the Child Support Agency. [31781]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Steve Hemingsley to Mr. David Rendel, dated 7 June 1996:

In the absence of Miss Chant, the Chief Executive, I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency field office in Newbury.

Between 1 June 1995 and 31 May 1996, the Newbury office has dealt with 351 cases requiring pre maintenance assessment work. The geographic area covered by the office falls within the following post code areas: RG7, RG8, RG14, RG17, RG18, RG19 and RG20.

I hope this is helpful.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what compensation his Department proposes to offer in respect of those who have been subject to breaches in the Data Protection Act 1984 by the Child Support Agency. [32001]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The agency's compensation scheme includes recompense for identifiable losses or harm suffered as a result of maladministration. Such payments could be made, in appropriate cases, to those affected by breaches in the Data Protection Act 1994.

In addition, it is a criminal offence under the Child Support Act 1991 to disclose information without lawful authority. The Child Support Agency is fully aware of its responsibilities and takes very seriously any suggestion that staff may have disclosed information unlawfully.

Actors (National Insurance)

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last met representatives of Equity to discuss the eligibility of actors for class I national insurance status; and what conclusions he has reached in the light of these discussions. [31581]

Mr. Heald: I met representatives of Equity on 1 April and I am undertaking further consultation with other interested parties before we reach any conclusions.

SCOTLAND

Gemini Housing Association

Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the extent to which the Gemini Housing Association operated within the code of conduct during the stock transfer procedures. [31129]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Scottish Homes operates separate codes of conduct for landlords seeking to acquire its houses and as regards the conduct of its own staff involved in transfer proposals. Any breaches of the codes would be investigated by Scottish Homes.

Mr. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland from what public funds Gemini Housing Association provided bingo and raffle prizes during the period of the stock housing transfer. [31141]

Mr. Robertson: I understand that these prizes were not purchased from public funds.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions during the last five years staff from Scottish Homes have intervened to take over the running of a housing association; if he will name the associations involved; and why Scottish Homes took the action. [31568]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 7 June 1996]: The information requested is a matter for Scottish Homes. I have asked the chairman, Mr. John Ward, to write to the hon. Member.

Health Service

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what procedures exist within the national health service in Scotland for resolving disputes between an NHS trust and a health board about an NHS trust's budget; and which Department within the Scottish Office oversees this. [31467]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 June 1996]: I expect health boards, other purchasers, and NHS trusts to resolve contractual matters at local level, involving their senior officials and board members if necessary.

However, if they fail to reach agreement there is provision for either of the parties to refer the matter to my right hon. Friend for determination. The decision is communicated in writing to both parties concerned and is final and binding.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement indicating what will be the impact on patient care of the cuts being proposed by the Ayrshire and Arran health board in the budget of the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust. [31469]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 June 1996]: The statements issued by the trust and the health board following agreement on the contract negotiations for 1996–97 make it clear that every effort will be made to ensure that the existing high standards of patient care will be maintained.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he intends to take to ensure that no job losses or reductions in service occur as a result of the budget enforced on the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust. [31470]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 June 1996]: It is for the trust to determine what measures it has to take to live within its contract income. The job losses involved are to be regretted but the cash savings released in the longer term will be available for re-investment in direct patient care.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which Department within the Scottish Office has responsibility for approving the performance levels which a health board in Scotland will seek from an NHS trust as part of its discussions with that trust before agreeing its budget. [31471]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 June 1996]: The performance and service requirements sought by each health board in advance of contract negotiations are set out in their annual purchasing intentions. These plans are produced and distributed by each board in January each year. They are not subject to approval by any Scottish Office Department.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to refer the budget dispute between the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust and Ayrshire and Arran health board to the independent arbitration procedure operating within the NHS in Scotland. [31472]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 June 1996]: It is for the relevant health board or NHS trust involved in contract negotiation to decide whether to refer a matter under dispute for arbitration.

I understand that the contract between Ayrshire and Arran health board and North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust has now been agreed and signed.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions officials from his Department have had with the management of the North Ayrshire and Arran NHS trust and Ayrshire and Arran health board in relation to the proposed budget for the trust. [31473]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 10 June 1996]: Officials of the Scottish Office Department of Health have been in regular contact with both the trust and the health board during the contract negotiations. While the Department is always ready to offer its assistance, we expect boards and trusts to reach agreement through local negotiation, as in this case.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Probation Officers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many probation officers were on secondment working in prisons on 1 April in each year since 1989; and if he will make a statement; [30348]

(2) how many probation officers he estimates will be working on secondment in prisons on 1 April in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, and (c) 1999. [30347]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 11 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the numbers of probation officers working in prisons on secondment.

The requested information is given in the following table. Figures for 1989–1995 are for 31 March. The figures (rounded to the nearest whole number) are for whole-time equivalent seconded probation staff.

	Number
31 March 1989	530
31 March 1990	543
31 March 1991	550
31 March 1992	594
31 March 1993	625
31 March 1994	621
31 March 1995	646
1 April 1996	596
1 April 1997 (Estimated)	541
1 April 1998 (Estimated)	528
1 April 1999 (Estimated)	509

The Prison Service remains committed to its partnership with the Probation Service to deliver the custodial and non-custodial parts of a prisoner's sentence effectively. Governors are responsible for ensuring that prisons deliver the right services to the right levels; they are in the best position to judge whether staff in the prison are providing value for money.

Understandably, governors have difficulty forecasting their requirements for seconded probation staff for 1998 and beyond, because it is too early to tell what their budgets will be, and because staffing levels need to be flexible, to meet changing requirements. They have been asked to adhere to the principles of the National Throughcare Framework—signed by the Prison and Probation Services—in determining the number of seconded probation staff needed to deliver ex-offenders adequately prepared for post-release supervision.

Prison Escapes

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have escaped from escorts in each of the last three years; and what steps he is taking to reduce this number. [31063]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 11 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about escapes from escort in the last 3 years and about steps being taken to reduce this number.

The table below shows the requested information.

Escapes from escort (financial years)

Year	Escapes from escort
1993–94	[1]125
1994–95	[1]66
1995–96	[1]70

[1] These figures include escapes from contractor's escorts which were previously the responsibility of the police. There were 23 such escapes in 1993–94; 15 in 1994–95; and 34 in 1995–96.

The prevention of escapes from escort is one of nine key performance indicators which are set out in the recently published Prison Service Corporate Plan, a copy of which is in the Library.

The Corporate Plan outlines a reduction in escapes from escort as one of six strategic aims for 1996–1999.

Steps being taken to reduce the number of escapes from escort include: the publishing of figures for all escapes, including escapes from escort, in the Service's monthly security briefing - this highlights any recurring problems; investigating escapes and passing, where appropriate, the findings to prisons and escort contractors; poster and other campaigns to prioritise security to staff; and the issuing of pocket handbooks on security in prisons and in escorting.

A revised security manual is being compiled and will be trialled this year for issue early in 1997.

Civil Defence Grant

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each local authority in Wales the total expenditure in 1996–97 approved as eligible for civil defence grant aid. [31086]

Mr. Sackville: The information available is as follows:

Authority	Grant approval £
Flintshire	70,000
Wrexham	70,000
Denbighshire	70,000
Powys	179,655
Newport	224,000
Blaneau Gwent	[1]—
Caerphilly	[1]—
Monmouth	[1]—
Torfaen	[1]—
Isle of Anglesey	100,000
Conwy	62,000
County of Gwynedd	62,000

[1] Newport acting as host authority.

I will write to the hon. Member about the other 10 authorities when the figures become available at the end of June.

Rehabilitation of Offenders Legislation

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list those offences which people are not required to declare under rehabilitation of offenders legislation; [31605]

(2) what plans he has to review the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. [31604]

Mr. Maclean: The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 provides that convictions are deemed to be "spent" after varying periods of time. Spent convictions do not have to be declared other than in certain specified circumstances. The key determinant of when an offence becomes spent is the length of the sentence passed in each case, not the offence itself. Sentences of more than two and a half years imprisonment never become spent.

We have no plans to review the Act itself. However, we are reviewing the scope and scale of the exceptions to the Act as part of a wider review of employment vetting arrangements. A revised list will be published shortly as part of a White Paper setting out our proposals.

Doncaster Prison

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will estimate the number of items that have been (a) smuggled into and (b) thrown over the fence of Doncaster prison since it was opened; and what estimate he has made of the proportion of total smuggling caused by items being (i) brought in and (ii) thrown over the prison fence; [31496]

(2) if he will make a statement on the training given to prison officers at Doncaster prison in suicide awareness; and if he will list the dates when this training has been reviewed; [31440]

(3) how many hours of education and training were available to prisoners and those on remand at Doncaster prison during the last 12 months; how many hours were used by inmates; and if he will make a statement. [31485]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about education and training; training in suicide awareness; and estimates of smuggling at Doncaster prison.

Over the last 12 months, 179,419 hours of education and training were made available to prisoners at Doncaster prison, including those on remand, of which 127,623 hours were used by prisoners.

Every prison custody officer at Doncaster prison receives a minimum of four hours suicide awareness training before they take up post. This is supplemented with a minimum of four further training sessions as part of the annual training plan in the prison. The suicide awareness training is reviewed monthly by the establishment's suicide awareness management group.

It is not possible to estimate the number of items that have either been smuggled into or thrown over the wall at Doncaster prison. A total of 87 visitors have been arrested for attempting to smuggle either money or drugs into the prison and nearly 500 prisoners have been charged for possession of drugs.

Any contraband found in Doncaster will have been smuggled in as it is not possible to throw items over the wall. This is because the prison operates a system of enclosed secure walkways and prisoners do not have access to areas next to the wall. The wall is also continually monitored internally and externally by closed circuit television.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what rehabilitation courses are currently held at Doncaster prison; how many applications have been made to attend these classes; what has been the number of places available in each month since the opening of the prison; and if he will make a statement. [31564]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter have been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about rehabilitation courses at Doncaster prison.

Doncaster prison runs a selection of rehabilitation courses which are available to all prisoners there. They are provided over a two to three month period to meet the changing needs of prisoners. There is a major emphasis on cognitive thinking skills as a generic programme which is appropriate for all prisoners.

Doncaster prison runs courses on alcohol misuse, drug rehabilitation, anger management, relationships, lifer groups, social skills, life skills (personal development) and parenting. There are also pre-release/employment courses, presentation workshops and gamblers anonymous and alcoholics anonymous courses. Probation staff also advise prisoners about employment, housing, training and unemployment benefits.

In May 1996 there were 267 applications for rehabilitation courses at Doncaster prison. Between January 1995 and May 1996, 1910 prisoners applied for and have received individual guidance interviews concerning employment, education, training, housing and state benefits.

The numbers of places available for rehabilitation courses since the prison has opened are shown in the attached table.

Numbers of places available on rehabilitation courses at Doncaster prison since the prison opened

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration is being given to making Doncaster prison a mixed prison; and if he will make a statement. [31563]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about consideration being given to making Doncaster a mixed prison.

Although Doncaster holds both adult and young offenders, there are no plans to change it to a mixed-sex prison.

Ethnic Minority Employees

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of those serving in (a) the police forces and (b) the Prison Service, are from ethnic minority groups. [32188]

Mr. Maclean: The latest figures available show that the percentage of members from ethnic minority groups serving in police forces in England and Wales was 1.75 per cent. as at September 1995, and 2.96 per cent. in the Prison Service as at December 1995.

Euro 96

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the extra cost of policing the Euro 96 competition in respect of visitors (a) during transit and (b) during their stay in the United Kingdom. [32257]

Mr. Maclean: The information is not available in the form requested. The Association of Chief Police Officers has estimated that the cost of policing for the European football championships could be around £5.5 million.

Buckley Hall Prison

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prison officers were required to work a double shift at Buckley Hall prison on 29 April; and what were the reasons for the requirement; [31921]

(2) how many prison officers were transferred from Wolds prison to Buckley Hall prison in April; what was the total number of shifts carried out by the transferred staff; and if Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons was informed of temporary prison officers working at Buckley Hall prison when it visited the prison following the escape of four prisoners on 23 April. [31922]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters have been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 11 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the doubling of prison custody officer shifts at Buckley Hall prison on 29 April 1996 and about the use of detached duty staff at Buckley Hall prison.

On 29 April one member of staff was asked to work a double shift and one member of staff was asked to extend his shift, both for operational reasons.

Four members of staff from the Wolds prison performed detached duty at Buckley Hall prison in April. They were deployed to support their colleagues at Buckley Hall prison and to gain experience in a different work environment. Each member of staff worked a total of five shifts each; these shifts were worked on a supernumerary basis.

Although an inquiry was commissioned into the escape of four prisoners on 23 April 1996, there was a no visit by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Prisons at this time.

Re-convictions

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest re-conviction rates in the (a) one year and (b) two years following (i) release from custody and (ii) completion of community supervision for each police authority in England and Wales; if he will indicate the methodology used and the associated research; and if he will make a statement. [31387]

Miss Widdecombe: With respect to (i), the most recent available information relates to a sample of sentenced prisoners discharged from custody during 1992. The table additionally contains re-conviction rates within one and two years of commencement of probation or community service based on a sample of offenders commencing orders in 1992.

Differences between re-conviction rates cannot simply be taken to show that one disposal is better than another. For example, the type of offenders will vary between disposals and there are other important factors discussed later in my answer.

Re-conviction rates within one and two years of discharge from prison or of commencement of probation or community service orders in 1992.
Figures in brackets give the range above and below the estimate that rates are likely to vary according to change[1]

[1] This range for chance variation is based on a 95 per cent. confidence interval, ie. the interval in which the true value is likely to lie for 19 out of 20 occasions. For example, the two-year rate for custody in Avon and Somerset is 60 per cent. and the 95 per cent. confidence interval has upper and lower bounds of 72 and 58 per cent. respectively.
[2] Figures are not provided for the City of London police for the probation and community service sample because rates would be based on only 13 offenders.

The methodology used to produce the rates for custody is described in the "Prison Statistics, England and Wales, 1994", Cm. 3087; a similar methodology was used to produce the rates for community supervision, described in "Probation Statistics, England and Wales, 1994". Some categories of offender were sampled more intensively than others to obtain better estimates for sub-groups.

The Police Authority was identified by reference to records relating to the last conviction for a standard list offence prior to release from prison or commencement of an order; usually this is the conviction that gives rise to the custodial sentence or the community supervision.

The samples for analysis were drawn with the purpose of producing results at the England and Wales level. Reconviction rates at the local level need to be interpreted with some caution as the size of the samples can be relatively small. For this reason, information on the numbers of offenders on which rates are based is included in the table, as well as information on the likely range of chance variation for estimates.

It should also be noted that comparisons between reconviction rates are affected by differences in the age, sex, previous convictions and other characteristics of offenders receiving the sentences, as described in detail in Home Office research study No. 136, "Explaining reconviction rates; a critical analysis".

This study mainly discusses reconviction rates within two years of release from prison or commencement of an order. A two year follow-up period is more usual than a one year follow-up as a significant number of offenders are usually reconvicted in the period between the one and two year points.

It should be noted that an ex-prisoner discharged from prison is less likely to be convicted of offences committed before the release date—such offences could be dealt with while an offender is in prison—than an offender commencing community supervision would be in respect of offences committed before the commencement date for his or her order. Results in the study indicate that removing such offences from consideration is likely to decrease reconviction rates within two years of commencement of an order relative to those for immediate custody by about 4 percentage points.

Factors such as police clear-up rates are likely to be related to regional variations in reconviction rates. It is also known that the recording of convictions by the Metropolitan police between 1987 and 1992 was not complete and this will have had some effect on the results. This is discussed in appendix 2 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1994", Cm 3010.

With respect to (ii) the most recently available information relates to a sample of offenders commencing probation or community service during 1987.

Reconviction rates that are usually quoted relate to reconviction within a set period following commencement of an order. Completion of an order does not necessarily imply completion without reoffending and a proportion of those completing orders will be reconvicted on the date of termination. For this reason, the following table quotes rates that both include and exclude reconvictions on the termination date. The overall reconviction rate within two years of completion is 45 per cent. if one excludes reconvictions on the termination date, but rises to 40 per cent. when they are included.

Re-conviction rates within one and two years of completion of probation or community service based on a sample of offenders commencing orders in 1987.
Figures in brackets give the range above and below the estimate that rates are likely vary according to chance[1].

TREASURY

Smuggling

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Customs and Excise anti-drug smuggling officers there were in (a) the west midlands and (b) the United Kingdom in each year since 1990; and what plans he has to decrease the number during (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [31096]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Anti-smuggling officers are not confined to the detection of drugs. It would not be in the public interest to reveal the number of officers deployed in the west midlands.

As some anti-smuggling activity is performed on overtime and some is performed by multi-functional staff, resources are recorded in staff years rather than numbers of posts.

The number of staff years allocated each year since 1990–91 was as follows:

1990–91: 3,630

1991–92: 3,558

1992–93: 3,420

1993–94: 3,100

1994–95: 3,347

1995–96: 3,170.

There are no plans to decrease the number of officers in 1996–97.

The 1994 Customs fundamental expenditure review of prohibitions and restrictions recommended that staff reductions could be made, subject to enhanced targeting, and 292 posts were withdrawn in 1995–96, including 50 diverted into additional intelligence activity. The effects of this reduction are being carefully monitored in 1996–97 before a decision is taken as to whether further reduction of 300 or some lesser amount should take place in 1997–98.

Departmental Software

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's involvement in the development of a software package to allow PAYE/NICS/VAT/CSO requirements to be integrated; and when he expects this to be possible. [31902]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 10 June 1996]: The Inland Revenue, Contributions Agency and Customs and Excise have a number of projects under way as part of their joint working programmes, as indicated in the reply of 21 May, Official Report, column 358. The programmes are focused in particular on ways to ease business burdens in meeting their obligations, but there are no plans to integrate information technology systems.

Value Added Tax

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total revenue from VAT in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and what it would have been if the level and scope of VAT remained unchanged since (a) May 1979, (b) March 1991 and (c) April 1992. [31600]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Net receipts of VAT for financial years 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96 are as follows:

1993—94: 38.9 billion

1994–95: 41.8 billion

1995–96: 43.1 billion (provisional).

Estimated net VAT receipts if the level and scope of VAT had remained unchanged since (a) May 1979, (b) March 1991 and (c) April 1992 are as follows:

(£ billion)

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
(a)	18	19	20
(b)	33	35	36
(c)	39	41	42

These estimates take account only of the main changes in the scope and level of VAT. They make no allowance for the behavioural changes which would result from changes to the tax regime.

Income Tax

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue was raised from one penny of the basic rate of income tax in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [31601]

Mr. Jack: Information is available in table 6 of the tax ready reckoner, copies of which are available in the Library.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Child Abduction

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will state for the latest year for which figures are available the number of abducted children returned to the United Kingdom from other EU countries and the number of abducted children returned by the United Kingdom to other EU countries. [32292]

Mr. Streeter: Figures are available only for the number of cases or requests for the return of children dealt with by the child abduction unit with respect to England and Wales. The number of cases dealt with in respect of children (a) brought to England and Wales from other EU states; and (b) taken to other EU states from England and Wales, in 1995, the latest year for which figures are available, is given in the table. The table distinguishes between those cases in which children were returned under judicial direction and those where they were returned voluntarily, and also shows the number of cases in which an application to a court for the return of children was unsuccessful.

1995—The Hague and European convention cases

1995—The Hague and European convention cases
European Union contracting states

Children taken from England and Wales	16	27	2

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will state the number of requests for return to the United Kingdom of abducted children made to each country under The Hague convention by his Department in the latest year for which figures are available [32303]

Mr. Streeter: Applications made by the Central Authority for England and Wales for the return to the United Kingdom of abducted children under The Hague convention are not separately recorded. The number of applications made under both The Hague and European conventions for the return of children and the enforcement of access orders in 1995, the latest year for which figures are available, is given in the table:

Country application made to	Number of applications made
Australia	9
Belgium	2
Canada	7
Cyprus	3
Denmark	8
Finland	1
France	15
Germany	17
Greece	4
Ireland	35
Israel	2
Italy	5
Netherlands	9
New Zealand	6
Norway	3
Portugal	2
Spain	17
Sweden	2
Switzerland	1
USA	38
Total	186

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will state the expenditure on legal aid in child abduction cases in the latest year for which figures are available and the estimated amount of that expenditure that was paid to legal aid claimants from overseas who were seeking the return of their children from the United Kingdom to a country overseas. [32293]

Mr. Streeter: The net cost to the legal aid fund of child abduction cases closed in the year 1995–96—that is, cases where the final bills were received—was £1.6 million. This does not include payments made on account in respect of cases that were not closed in 1995–96. Of the expenditure on child abduction cases in 1995–96, £905,000 was applied to overseas residents.

Information on cases involving legal aid claimants resident overseas is not collected centrally. Many claimants from abroad will be United Kingdom citizens. Nationality is not a factor in determining qualification for legal aid; legal aid is available to anyone having a justiciable cause falling within the jurisdiction of England and Wales, provided they satisfy the statutory requirements governing financial means and legal merit.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the number of children known to his Department to have been abducted out of the United Kingdom in each of the last five years. [32302]

Mr. Streeter: This information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) what assessment he has made in relation to his Department's responsibilities of whether The Hague convention of the civil aspects of international child abduction requires either amendment or clarification of the working practices under the convention; and what steps he will take to try to secure improvement; [32301]

(2) what assessment he has made in relation to his Department's responsibilities of whether The Hague convention on the civil aspects of international child abduction requires either amendment or clarification of the working practices under the convention; and what steps he will take to try to secure improvements. [32299]

Mr. Streeter: Assessments were made in advance of meetings of the convention states at The Hague in October 1989 and January 1993 to review the operation of the convention. In general, the convention has operated satisfactorily from this country's point of view. A new area of difficulty has arisen, however, and this is being pursued with the country concerned. There is to be another review meeting at The Hague early next year.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in how many new cases his Department's child abduction unit carried out work relating to The Hague convention on child abduction and the European custody convention in each year since 1990. [32300]

Mr. Streeter: The number of new cases in which the chid abduction unit for England and Wales (a) received applications for the return of children or applications for the enforcement of an access order from other states, and (b) made applications to other states for the return of children or for the enforcement of an access order, in each year since 1990, is given in the table:

Year	Applications received	Applications made

PRIME MINISTER

European Union (Non-co-operation)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy not to relax the policy of non-co-operation with the EU and its institutions until the EU world-wide ban on exports of British beef has been lifted. [32181]

The Prime Minister: I made it clear in my statement of 21 May, Official Report, columns 99–101, that progress would not be possible in the intergovernmental conference or elsewhere until we had agreement on the lifting of the ban on beef derivatives—which we have now achieved—and a clear framework for the lifting of the wider ban.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the membership of the group set up to oversee the policy of non-co-operation with the EU; how often it is planned that it should meet; and if he will make a statement. [31221]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 7 June 1996]: A committee meets regularly under my chairmanship to oversee the policy of non-co-operation. Members of the Committee include the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of State for Agriculture. Other Ministers are invited as appropriate.

I welcome the decision taken by the Commission on 5 June to lift the ban on beef derivatives with effect from 10 June. We now need early progress on agreement on a framework to lift the wider ban.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the occasions on which the United Kingdom has not co-operated with the European Union nations since he made his oral statement on 21 May, Official Report, columns 99–101; and if he will make a statement. [31222]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 7 June 1996]: I made it clear in my statement of 21 May, Official Report, columns 99–101, that we would not be able to agree decisions requiring unanimity until the ban on beef derivatives was lifted and we have an agreement on a framework for the lifting of the wider ban.

I welcome the decision taken by the Commission on 5 June to lift the ban on beef derivatives with effect from 10 June. We now need early progress on agreement on a framework to lift the wider ban.

Since my statement on 21 May we have withheld agreement on over 60 measures at various EC meetings.

Health Risks (Tobacco and Beef)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will discuss with Chancellor Köhl the health risk to Germans from (a) smoking tobacco and (b) eating British beef; and if he will instruct the United Kingdom representative to raise that issue at the European Court of Justice as evidence of discrimination against the United Kingdom. [32083]

The Prime Minister: No. I have no plans to do so.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 June. [31176]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 June. [31177]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) of 17 May, Official Report, column 720, what assessment he has made of the adequacy of co-ordination between Government Departments in respect of the issuing of public interest immunity certificates in relation to the Lockerbie case; and what factors underlay their issue. [32291]

The Prime Minister: I understand that the interested Government Departments consulted with each other in connection with the signing of public interest immunity certificates by their respective Ministers. Public interest immunity was claimed in these certificates where the relevant Minister considered that it would be injurious to the public interest for particular matters to be the subject of evidence.

Mr. T. T. Tsui

Mr. Byers: To ask the Prime Minister on what dates in August 1991 he met in his official capacity Mr. T. T. Tsui at 10 Downing street; how many civil servants were present at the meeting; and what subjects were discussed. [32159]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 10 June 1996]: So far as I am aware, none.

Uniformed Services (Compensation)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will review the circumstances in which damages or compensation are payable to (a) the police and (b) other uniformed services. [31827]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 7 June 1996]: No. Where someone claims negligence, it is for the courts to decide whether damages are payable, taking into account all relevant circumstances, which will sometimes include the applicant's occupation.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Research Councils

Mr. Miller: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what was the total number of applications claiming post-transfer staff costs on behalf of research councils; and what was the total number of these that were awarded for each of the financial years 1990–91 to 1995–96; [31587]

(2) what was the total of staff costs awarded for pre-transfer and post-transfer staff groups involving research councils for each of the financial years 1990–91 to 1995–96; what was the breakdown of staff numbers by staff group; and if he will list those groups, supported as direct costs involving research councils for each of the financial years 1990–91 to 1995–96. [31586]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 18 March 1996, Official Report, columns 47–50, which contains schedules covering allocations to the research councils, the number of awards and a breakdown of the main components of these awards under various categories of cost. Information on the further breakdown of staff costs and numbers now sought could be obtained only through an analysis of paper records at a disproportionate cost to each of the six research councils.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31529]

Mr. John M. Taylor: This Department uses executive search agencies under the supervision of its personnel staff to help recruit staff to the senior civil service to improve the effectiveness of the DTI in meeting its objectives and to broaden the skills base at senior management levels. Such agencies work strictly in accordance with the code of practice drawn up by the civil service commissioners. Recruitment at other levels has been negligible.

Child Labour

Mr Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will write to FIFA and UEFA to urge them to investigate whether their officially licensed merchandise is produced by child labour. [32251]

Mr. John M. Taylor: It is not my intention to do so.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will support the adoption of a code of conduct, using internationally recognised standards, for all manufacturers and sub-contractors of licensed products to ensure that products are not made by child labour. [31790]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 10 June 1996]: The Government deplore any exploitation of children and we press all countries which have signed labour conventions to meet their obligations. It is for firms themselves to consider whether to operate according to a code of good practice. Some already do.

Motor Bikes

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the value of after-market components for motor bikes (a) sold in the United Kingdom and (b) exported; and how many people are employed in the after-market component industry in the UK. [32197]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 10 June 1996]: There are no official figures available for this sector.

Cars (Trade Balance)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the deficit in the United Kingdom trade in cars in real terms in each of the last four years; and what estimate he has made of future trends in the balance of trade. [32089]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 10 June 1996]: The information requested is given in the table. The depressed level of consumer demand for cars in Europe has slowed improvements in the United Kingdom's balance of trade in cars. However, in the longer term, the decision by major manufacturers to expand production in the UK should boost exports.

Year	Deficit in trade in cars, at 1990 prices (£ billion)
1992	–1.9
1993	–2.7
1994	–2.4
1995	–1.4

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what safeguards are applied by his Department to ensure diversity of ethnic origin in the appointments to lay membership of industrial tribunals. [32026]

Mr. John M. Taylor: In making appointments, the Secretary of State is required to consult organisations representative of employers and employees. In the 1995 appointments exercise, as previously, such organisations were notified of the criteria for appointment and asked to encourage applications from the ethnic minorities. The Commission for Racial Equality was also asked to propose names for the organisations consulted to consider. The percentage of ethnic minority lay members rose to 4.6 per cent. after the 1995 appointments round, from 4.1 per cent. previously.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will give a breakdown of those people who applied for, but were not appointed to, lay membership of industrial tribunals in the 1995 round of appointments, by nominating body. [32023]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 7 June 1996]: My officials have sent the consultation paper to a wide range of interested parties. The document has also been available for collection from DTI headquarters. A list of those who have been sent the document has been complied. A copy of that list is being placed in the Library of the House.

WALES

Local Government Archives

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking to monitor conformity with his "Guidance on the Care, Preservation and Management of Records," June 1995. [31100]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 4 June, Official Report, column 372.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31394]

Mr. Hague: The information is as follows:

	Amount spent	Staff recruited [1]
1994–95	£162,478.22	23
1995–96	£166,453.88	27

[1] Does not include staff engaged for a year or less.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31409]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Office and Cadw, the Welsh Historic Monuments agency, did not use executive search agencies or employment companies to fill vacancies in the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years. They would consider doing so if this offered a cost-effective means of recruitment consistent with the principles of fair and open competition and selection on merit.

Public Appointments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) women and (b) men have been appointed to public bodies in the past year; and to which public bodies (i) women and (ii) men have been appointed. [32495]

Mr. Hague: This information is contained in "Appointments by the Secretary of State for Wales, 1 June 1996", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many women (a) applied to be on the public appointments register and (b) were placed on the public appointments register, in each year since 1993–94; [32491]

(2) what assessment he has made of the success of his Department's campaign, Diary 1995–96, to persuade more women to apply for inclusion on the public appointments register; [32493]

(3) what measures he intends to take to increase the participation of women on public bodies; and if he will make a statement; [32494]

(4) what assessment he has made of the success of the 1995–96 campaign of the NHS Opportunity 2000 unit to persuade more women to apply for inclusion on the public appointments register. [32492]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Office has taken a number of steps, including involvement in the NHS Opportunity 2000 campaign, to encourage more women to volunteer for public appointment.

The number of women on the register has increased from 470 in April 1993—749 in April 1994 and 983 in April 1995—to 1,068 in April 1996. The percentage of appointments made by the Secretary of State held by women has risen from 18 per cent. in 1990 to 24 per cent. as at 1 June 1996.

The Welsh Office is committed to a policy of equal opportunities for all candidates; all candidates are considered on their merits and suitability for a particular post. We will continue to encourage women to volunteer for public appointment.

Wheelchairs

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representation he has received on the lack of provision of indoor/outdoor wheelchairs for severely disabled people by the NHS in Wales; and what plans he has on this matter. [32503]

Mr. Hague: In addition to representations from hon. Members, I have received representations from five voluntary organisations representing the disabled. My officials, in discussion with NHS representatives are identifying possible means of improving the provision of wheelchair services in Wales.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 4 June, Official Report, column 373, what representations he has received from chief ambulance officers and the chairmen of the Welsh ambulance trusts concerning (a) financial viability, (b) revisions of boundaries, (c) mergers and (d) potential efficiency savings; and if he will make a statement. [32504]

Mr. Hague: None. The Welsh Office discusses these issues, and others, with ambulance NHS trusts as part of the regular monitoring process.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Street Children

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the amount of grants to the Consortium for Street Children from the Overseas Development Administration in (i) 1994–95 and (ii) 1995–96 and (b) the projected grant for the financial year 1996–97; and if he will make a statement. [32189]

Mr. Hanley: During the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96, the ODA provided a total of £30,000 to the Consortium for Street Children in support of the production of a resource directory. In addition, in 1995–96, £16,100 was provided for the development of a pilot project on girl street children. A further project proposal is currently under consideration.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department will be represented at the European conference on street children worldwide in Amsterdam on 20 to 23 June. [32186]

Mr. Hanley: The ODA will not be represented at the European conference on street children worldwide. We understand that this is a conference for non-governmental organisations to exchange information on the problems facing street children.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and which non-governmental organisations are being funded by the Overseas Development Administration for street children rehabilitation projects; in which countries they are based; what are these projects; what is the amount of funding granted; and for what length of time. [32185]

Mr. Hanley: Details of the joint funding scheme—JFS—grants provided to non-governmental organisations for current street children projects are shown in the table:

Catholic Fund for Overseas Development : £17,347

Christian Aid: £18,535

OXFAM: £2,444

The year 1995–96 is the latest for which information is available in respect of the block grant agencies.

Prisoners of Conscience (Ghana)

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on prisoners of conscience in Ghana; and what recent representations he has received on this subject. [31981]

Mr. Hanley: We are not aware of any prisoners of conscience in Ghana and have received no representations on this subject recently.

TRANSPORT

Vehicle Emissions (Prosecutions)

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many owners or operators of cars and lorries have been prosecuted for emitting noxious fumes, in each of the past five years for which records are available; how many of such prosecutions have led to convictions; and what penalties were imposed. [32170]

Mr. Norris: Very few emission offences are taken to court because most offenders rectify defects quickly when faced with the prospect of prohibition or prosecution.

The precise information requested is not available because the records kept by the Home Office do not separately identify any emissions offences prosecuted by the police.

Oceanic Air Traffic Control System

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to change the terms of the competition for the new oceanic air traffic control system from those set out in the invitation to tender; and what is the timetable for the final decision. [32469]

Mr. Norris: The Civil Aviation Authority, which will let the tender, has no plans to change the terms of competition for the new oceanic air traffic control centre from those set out in the invitation to participate which was issued in July 1995. The timetable for the final decision—January 1997—remains unchanged.

Fatal Accidents (Foreign Licensees)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the names of drivers of motor vehicles not holding driving licences in the United Kingdom but holding licences of nations whose licences are recognised, who have been found guilty of driving offences where fatalities were involved since 1990; and if he will inform the relevant Governments of the name and licence number of the persons convicted, together with the circumstances of the accident. [32349]

Mr. Norris: Information from the national driver licensing register is treated in strict confidence under the provision of the Data Protection Acts. Except for law enforcement purposes, information is not disclosed without the consent of the individual.

The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency informs other driver licensing authorities of the details whenever driving licences are revoked.

Ramsgate Harbour Approach Road

Mr. Aitken: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received the report of his inspector on the compulsory purchase orders for the Ramsgate harbour approach road; when he expects to reach his decision on the inspector's report; and if he will make a statement. [32424]

Mr. Norris: We still await the report. I am not able to say when the decision on the orders will be issued. My officials are fully aware of the need for an early decision and I can assure my right hon. Friend that matters will be brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible.

Vehicle Testing Station (Purfleet)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what discussions his Department has had with the Health and Safety Executive in relation to the Vehicle Inspectorate and the Driving Standards Agency at the heavy goods vehicle testing station at Purfleet; and what action is planned by his Department; [32403]

(2) what action his Department has taken to replace the boundary fence surrounding the heavy goods vehicle testing station at Purfleet; and what warning signs and traffic management barriers have been erected to separate the Driving Standards Agency and Vehicle Inspectorate traffic routes. [32402]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Vehicle Inspectorate to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ron Oliver to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 11 June 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about replacement of the boundary fence at Purfleet Goods Vehicle Testing Station and discussions with the Health and Safety Executive.

A replacement fence was erected on three of the boundaries in March. There have been no further complaints of children using the site as a short cut, since this action has been taken. The fence on the final front boundary requires planning permission and is affected by highway alternations needed by the Channel Tunnel Link. A planning application has been submitted and it is anticipated that it will take 6 weeks to process.

A traffic management barrier has also been erected on the site to assist segregation of the Vehicle Inspectorate and Driving Standards Agency's work.

Further works to be undertaken this summer include additional tarmacking to ease traffic movement and parking within the site, and renewing directional signs. Discussions on the latter will involve the Driving Standards Agency to establish their particular requirements. Discussions have been held with the Health and Safety Executive regarding the proposed improvements and we are advising them of progress as it occurs.

British Rail (Objectives)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what objectives he has set for the chairman of British Rail for 1996–97. [32644]

Sir George Young: I have written to the chairman formally recording the objectives that had been agreed for the period 1 April 1996 to 31 March 1997. Copies of the letter have been placed in the Library.

Light Dues

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to change the light dues system when the Decca navigation system comes to an end. [32499]

Mr. Norris: No decisions have yet been made regarding the future of the Decca navigator system. We have no plans to change the light dues system.

Northolt Airport

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy not to increase permitted aircraft movements from Northolt airport; and if he will make a statement. [30992]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The station continues to operate on the basis of 7,000 civil movements a year.

In its recent report on UK airport capacity, the House of Commons Transport Committee included a number of conclusions and recommendations relating to increased civil use of RAF Northolt. The Government will respond in due course to these and to the other recommendations of the Committee.

DEFENCE

Colchester Military Training Centre

13. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the defence implications of the Colchester military corrective and training centre becoming a young offenders' institution; and if he will make a statement. [30895]

Mr. Soames: The creation of a young offenders institution within the military corrective training centre will have no implications for Britain's defence.

Joint Rapid Deployment Force

14. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the role of the joint rapid deployment force; and if he will make a statement. [30896]

Mr. Portillo: The joint rapid deployment force will strengthen the UK's capability effectively and rapidly to deploy military forces worldwide in support of our interests. It will be capable of fulfilling a wide range of combat or non-combat missions.

24. Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the improvement to Britain's defence capability from the introduction of the joint rapid deployment force. [30907]

Mr. Soames: The military response to future challenges will almost certainly be on a joint service basis. The joint rapid deployment force will enhance the UK's ability to respond very rapidly to future crises, drawing from all three services. The core of the JRDF will be three Commando Brigade and five Airborne Brigade, but it will also draw on other elements across the services.

Tomahawk Cruise Missiles

15. Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to procure Tomahawk cruise missiles. [30897]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced in the House on 13 July 1995, Official Report, column 1092, that we were proceeding with the procurement of Tomahawk. On 16 October 1995 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced during the defence debate Official Report, column 51, that an order had been placed that day for 65 conventionally armed Tomahawk cruise missiles with the US Department of Defence. There are currently no plans to purchase further missiles.

Polaris

16. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to decommission Polaris submarines. [30898]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The process of decommissioning the Polaris submarines involves de-fuelling, de-equipping and laying up the vessels for storage afloat before their final disposal. This process has been completed for HMS Revenge, but not yet for the other Polaris submarines.

Former Yugoslavia

17. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on NATO's peace implementation force in the former Yugoslavia. [30899]

Mr. Portillo: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick).

Land Mines

18. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to replace his Department's stocks of anti-personnel land mines. [30900]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We plan to destroy nearly half our current stocks of anti-personnel mines without replacement. We have reached no decisions on our future requirements.

Procurement Projects

19. Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total expenditure his Department has identified in the last year which is due to cost overruns on procurement projects. [30901]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Information on Defence equipment cost control performance was published in December 1995 in the MoD's performance report, Cm 3055, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

RAF Aircraft Crashes

20. Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF aircraft crashed in 1996; and if he will make a statement. [30903]

Mr. Soames: A total of nine RAF aircraft have crashed in eight accidents. Separate RAF boards of inquiry are carrying out thorough investigations to determine the causes of seven of the accidents and to consider what action may be necessary to minimise the risk of recurrence. In line with normal policy, a summary of the findings of each of these inquiries will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses in due course. An investigation into the most recent accident, which occurred on 26 May in Portugal, is being carried out by the Portuguese authorities in line with the NATO standard agreement on such matters.

Surface Ships

21. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about present procurement plans for new surface ships for the Royal Navy. [30904]

Mr. Arbuthnot: A number of new surface ships are planned. These include the helicopter carrier HMS Ocean; five type 23 frigates, seven Sandown class mine-hunters, and the survey vessel HMS Scott, all currently on order. In addition, we are in negotiations with VSEL over a contract for up to two assault ships; we continue to make good progress on the common new generation frigate; and we have issued an invitation to tender for up to two auxiliary oilers.

Married Housing Stock

22. Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultation he had with members of the armed forces before he announced his plans for the married housing stock. [30905]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The proposal to transfer ownership of the married quarters estate in England and Wales to the private sector has been developed over many months in full consultation with the services. We have also had regular contract with the service wives' organisations and have taken their views fully into account.

Joint and Combined Exercises

23. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what priority he attaches to joint and combined exercises; and if he will make a statement. [30906]

Mr. Soames: I attach the very highest priority to both joint and combined exercises. We have recently completed the highly successful exercise, Purple Star, with the Americans, which saw a major amphibious landing and the largest parachute drop since the second world war. Key elements of the joint rapid deployment force, which becomes operational on 1 August this year, were involved including three Commando Brigade and five Airborne Brigade, an aircraft carrier and amphibious group as well as RAF front line and supporting aircraft. Responsibility for planning and conducting joint and combined exercises now rests with the new permanent joint headquarters at Northwood, which has been formed as a centre of excellence in preparing for and executing joint operations.

Propeller Factories

25. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next proposes to visit a propeller factory. [30909]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence visited Dowty Aerospace recently. The company is involved in supplying propellers for the RAF's C-130J programme, and is also a member of the Lockheed Martin team offering the Orion 2000 in response to the invitation to tender for RMPA. All three tenders for RMPA are currently being assessed and we are working towards letting a contract with the selected prime contractor later this year. I cannot comment on the bid at this stage, but I can assure my hon. Friend that all the bids are receiving full and equal consideration.

School Cadet Forces

27. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) boys and (b) girls are currently enrolled in school cadet forces; at what cost; and if he will make a statement. [30911]

Mr. Soames: There are currently (a) 33,300 boys and (b) 6,100 girls enrolled in the combined cadet force in schools. My Department's contribution to the cost of the combined cadet forces in 1994–95 was £7.4 million.

In addition, more than 200 units of the sea cadet corps, Army cadet force, and the air training corps meet in local education authority school property.

My colleagues and I are very much aware of the immense benefit that the cadet forces can bring to the education and well-being of the young people of this country. Parents and teachers alike recognise the value that cadet membership can bring to the broad education of young people.

Small Arms

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many small-arms weapons declared surplus to requirements by each of the armed services have been sold on the open market; and if he will make a statement. [31428]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Disposal Sales Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Keith Ellender, to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 7 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the sale of surplus small-arms weapons on the open market, as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Disposal Sales Agency.

A total of 40,700 surplus small-arms weapons were sold in the 3 years since June 1992. 40,000 of these were to Section 5 Licenced firearms dealers for export, and 700 were directly to overseas governments. These figures were given to your parliamentary colleague Dr David Clark, MP by Mr Arbuthnot in a written answer on 10 July 1995, Official Report, column 468. There have been no further sales since then. We are unable to give a breakdown between armed services, because the weapons are declared by a single service source on behalf of the other services, but they would be predominantly of Army origin.

Great Care is exercised in the sales of surplus small arms to ensure that they do not fall into the wrong hands. To this end the long standing policy of the MOD is not to sell weapons to UK traders for stock. Mr Arbuthnot explained the full current policy in another written answer on 10 July 1995. This appeared in the same column as the answer referred to earlier.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each of the last four years, for each of the armed services, the number of small-arms weapons declared surplus to requirements that have been (a) destroyed and (b) sold; and if he will make a statement. [31427]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Our records are not maintained in the format requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, in the last four years a total of 150,200 small arms have been destroyed and 40,700 sold.

SHL Software

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the contracts his Department and his agencies have with SHL software computer system; what is the current cost; when each contract ends; and what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract. [31435]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I assume that the company referred to is SHL Systemhouse UK Ltd., a member of the Canadian SHL Systemhouse Inc. group. While the MOD procurement executive has direct dealings with this company, there are only a few contracts and to divulge the cost and termination date details would be a breach of commercial confidence.

Ministry of Defence contracts generally contain a standard "break" condition which enables the Ministry to terminate a contract after a given period without penalty. There may also be other termination provisions, but these would be tailored to the circumstances of the particular contract.

Where chief executives of my Department's agencies exercise their responsibilities for this matter under the terms of their framework documents, I have asked them to write to the hon. Member direct.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 June 1996:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for Defence for details of contracts his Department and Agencies have with SHL software computer system. I am replying on behalf of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA).

I can confirm that DERA has no current contracts with SHL. We have, in the past, had a number of small value contracts with the company but these are all now completed.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from J. C. R. Hunt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Defence Secretary concerning SHL computer systems, as this falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Meteorological Office.

We currently have no contracts with the company.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from S. Parnell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 June 1996:

1. You recently asked the Secretary of State for Defence a Parliamentary Question about contracts the Ministry of Defence or its agencies have with SHL software computer system. As the issues raised fall within the responsibility of the Chief Executive your question has been referred to the Hydrographic Office for the provision of a response.

2. In the normal course of events my Chief Executive, Rear Admiral Clarke, would reply to you personally but unfortunately he is at present on official business overseas. In light of this I have been asked to respond.

3. In answer to your question the Hydrographic Office does not have any form of contract with SHL software computer system.

4. I hope this has been helpful.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures his Department has implemented during the last 12 months to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with his Department and its executive agencies; and what progress his Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31539]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department and its agencies continue to strive to improve the opportunities for women at all levels in the organisation, and though we recognise that we still have far too few women in senior positions, there are clear signs that the position is improving. For example, in each of the last three years almost a quarter of those promoted to grade 5 level in the administration group were women, compared with 9 per cent. in 1991 an nil in 1992.

Initiatives aimed at improving opportunities for women in my Department and its agencies include: the provision of nursery facilities; career breaks and flexible working; equal opportunities training for promotion board members; positive action training for women staff; and—newly established this year—a working group chaired by the chief scientist to advise on the recruitment, retention and promotion of women engineers.

BMARC

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of his investigation into the BMARC affair; and if he will publish the findings of the investigation. [32198]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Work undertaken by my Department to examine allegations that BMARC supplied naval guns to Iran via Singapore in the mid to late 1980s, including the work involved to assist the Trade and Industry Committee with its current BMARC inquiry, necessarily involved a number of officials in different parts of the MOD to varying degrees over the past 15 months. Records have not been routinely kept on time spent on this activity by officials and it is not therefore possible to provide the information requested.

My Department has submitted a written memorandum to the Committee and officials have appeared to provide oral evidence relevant to the inquiry. We stand ready to provide any further assistance that the Committee may require.

Explosives (Lunan Bay)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many explosive devices have been found at Lunan bay; what is their origin; and how they came to be at Lunan bay. [32536]

Mr. Soames: Some 600 world war two practice bombs have been discovered at Lunan bay. Their presence is consistent with the beach being used as a practice bombing range. Complete records of wartime activity are not available, but a surviving 1940 RAF air navigation chart indicates a bombing range at Lunan bay.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the numbers of explosive devices still to be uncovered at Lunan bay; and if he will make a statement. [32539]

Mr. Soames: A reconnaissance is to be conducted at Lunan bay by 33 Engineer Regiment to assess the situation.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what types of explosive devices have been found at Lunan bay; and if he will list the number and purpose of each type of explosive device. [32537]

Mr. Soames: Remnants of some 600 101b, 11.51b and 251b world war two practice bombs have been uncovered at Lunan bay. The practice bombs were used to test aircraft and crews for all aspects of bombing operations.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the explosive devices found at Lunan bay have been live; and how they were disposed of. [32538]

Mr. Soames: Explosive ordnance disposal teams have treated all remnants of world war two practice bombs as if they may have some residual active component, and disposed of them by controlled detonation using standard procedures.

Radiation, Menwith

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action his Department took in respect of the report to the senior police officer at Menwith on radiation around radome 4—No. 512-91—dated 29 September 1991. [32354]

Mr. Soames: There was no need for action by my Department. The comments regarding radiation around radome 4 were written in error. There is a zone around the radomes which is fenced off for security reasons to deter protesters and activists, who have regularly targeted the site, from damaging the equipment. There is no reason for any personnel employed at RAF Menwith Hill to avoid any particular radome for health and safety reasons.

Trident D5 Missiles

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the unit cost of purchasing Trident D5 missiles from the United States of America. [32053]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 10 June 1996]: For commercial and other reasons, it is not our practice to speculate about future prices. For estimates of the cost of the total Trident missile buy, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 14 March 1996, Official Report, column 678.

Millennium Exhibition

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage in what circumstances she would reconsider the national exhibition centre in Birmingham for the millennium exhibition. [32501]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Selection of the site for the millennium exhibition is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I have no independent role in this matter as Secretary of State.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will meet officials of the NEC in Birmingham to discuss their proposed plans to hold the millennium exhibition there. [32500]

Mrs. Bottomley: The selection of site for the millennium exhibition is a matter for the Millennium Commission. As chairman of the commission, I met representatives of the NEC together with other commissioners on 3 April.

SCOTLAND

Cairngorm Funicular Railway

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the (i) economic viability and (ii) likely passenger numbers in respect of the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm; if he will list the costs to his Department of the research and indicate if it is in the public domain. [31300]

Mr. Kynoch: None. Questions regarding the economic viability of the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm, including the related issue of the likely passenger numbers, are essentially matters for the applicant to address in consultation with those organisations from whom it is seeking funding.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to receive from the Cairngorms Partnership Board its proposed management strategy for the area; if he has requested proposals to conserve the montane zone; and what assessment he has made of the main threats to the successful conservation of this zone. [31304]

Mr. Kynoch: When my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Scotland established the Cairngorms Partnership last year he asked it to produce within 12 months a draft management strategy for the area including, as a priority, proposals for the conservation of the montane zone. I understand that the Cairngorms Partnership Board will shortly issue for consultation a draft management strategy which will include a section dealing specifically with the montane zone.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Cairngorms Partnership Board concerning the proposed construction of a funicular railway on Cairngorm; and if he will make a statement. [31302]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend has received two letters from the Cairngorm Partnership Board. The chief executive wrote on 4 July 1995 asking that he issue a direction requiring the planning authority to notify the application to him if they were minded to grant consent.

A further letter, dated 13 February 1996 was received from the board's chairman, Mr. David Laird, in which he advised my right hon. Friend of how the partnership viewed the way matters were developing.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 375, what is the predicted cost per job (a) created and (b) retained in the application by

Highlands and Islands Enterprise to incur expenditure on the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm, currently being considered; and how these costs per job compare with the average in the highlands and islands area.[31340]

Mr. Kynoch: The overall cost per job of the proposed Highlands and Islands Enterprise assistance as recorded in the request for the approval of my right hon. Friend is £7,616. Such a figure is comparable with that for similar large capital-intensive projects to which Highlands and Islands Enterprise has contributed.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 375, if the application by Highlands and Islands Enterprise to incur expenditure on the proposed funicular railway on Cairngorm takes account of the redundancies recently announced by the chairlift company. [31339]

Mr. Kynoch: The request for the approval of my right hon. Friend of the proposed financial contribution by Highlands and Islands Enterprise to the funicular railway project takes account of a range of factors, including the employment consequences, which in its view justify its proposed assistance to the project. No decision has yet been taken on the request.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research has been commissioned by (a) his office and (b) the Highlands and Islands Enterprise, to compare the value for money of grant aid to the proposed Cairngorm funicular railway with grants to other options for modernising the skiing facilities. [31303]

Mr. Kynoch: No research into such matters has been commissioned by the Scottish Office. The research commissioned by Highlands and Islands Enterprise is an operational matter for that organisation and I have asked the chairman of its board to write to the hon. Member.

Planning Applications

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in what circumstances he requires notification of planning applications where a planning authority is minded to grant permission that would constitute a departure from an approved structure plan. [31301]

Mr. Kynoch: Under the current planning legislation, it is entirely a matter for the authority to determine what constitutes a significant departure from the structure plan thus requiring an application to be notified to my right hon. Friend.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much his Department spent in recruiting staff to his Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31396]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My Department and its executive agencies, excluding the Scottish Prison Service, spent approximately £429,000 in the 1994–95 financial year to recruit 144 staff and £436,000 in 1995–96 to recruit 201 staff.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what use his Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within his Department or executive agencies administered by his Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31411]

Mr. Forsyth: My Department used executive search agencies on three occasions in 1994–95. The agencies employed were Goddard Kay Rogers and Associates Ltd., Korn Ferry International and Thompson Partners Ltd. The total cost was £82,884.35. The value of individual contracts is a matter for the companies themselves and is regarded as commercial in confidence. Neither my Department nor its executive agencies used executive search agencies during 1995–96.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer in the Scottish Grand Committee in Dunfermline on 20 May, if the Crown Office will ask Professor Brian Caddy to include in his report, an assessment of the work of Dr. Fereday and Dr. Hayes at Royal Armament Research and Development Establishment in relation to Lockerbie. [31882]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. The review being conducted by Professor Brian Caddy is directed towards determining in which cases contamination might have occurred and to make recommendations for further action in order that a recurrence might be avoided. The terms of Professor Caddy's review did not invite him to undertake a general scrutiny of the work of any employees, or former employees, engaged in work at the forensic explosives laboratory in relation to any particular case or cases.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 71, about the implications for the Lockerbie inquiry of developments in respect of the forensic science laboratory in Kent, on what evidence the charges against the two Libyans depend. [31944]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 June 1996]: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate cannot discuss details of evidence while criminal proceedings are pending.

Legal Service (Tayside and Fife)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions the interim procurator fiscal has appeared in the sheriff court at Arbroath since his appointment. [32527]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The interim procurator fiscal at Arbroath has not appeared personally in the sheriff court there since his appointment.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many trials were fixed and how many and what percentage of trials proceeded with evidence led in respect of (i) the sheriff courts of Arbroath and Forfar and district courts of Arbroath, Brechin and Forfar and (ii) the remainder of the sheriff courts and district courts within the sheriffdom of Tayside Central and Fife between (a) January and December 1994, (b) January and December 1995 and (c) December 1995 and April 1996. [32508]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Figures for the district courts are not held centrally. Figures for the sheriff courts are as follows.

	Trial fixed	Trials evidence led	Percentage of trials evidence led to trials fixed
January to December 1994
Arbroath	578	147	25
Forfar	438	100	23
Remaining courts	9,314	2,390	26
January to December 1995
Arbroath	486	90	19

NHS Trusts (Staff Compensation)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the costs to each NHS trust from (a) damages, (b) legal fees and (c) administration and management time arising from compensation claims by members of staff in each of the last three financial years. [32505]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Health Service (Lifting and Handling Regulations)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which Scottish hospitals have not had appropriate lifting equipment for use by nursing staff in continuous use since the introduction of EU lifting and handling regulations; and what action has been taken in each case. [32507]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

New Car Assessment Programme

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when his Department expects to make a statement on the reliability of the information collated as part of the research on the feasibility of a new car assessment programme; and when this information will be published. [32426]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply. The work is not yet finished. An announcement will be made as soon as possible after the report on this work is completed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefit Claimants (Personal Details)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to pass on the personal details of benefit claimants to advertisers and direct mail companies. [30397]

Mr. Heald: None. There is a standard clause in contracts awarded by this Department that information obtained for the administration of social security benefits remains the property of the Department. All information is held in confidence and used only for the purpose for which it is collected.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; which agencies have been employed for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30569]

Mr. Burt: None.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many unitary authorities are failing to make the first payment of housing benefit within 14 days of the completed forms. [30971]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not yet available.

Apart from the Isle of Wight, which commenced unitary status in April 1995, no other new unitary authorities commenced operations before April 1996. The most recent information available centrally is for 1994–95.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total sum paid out in any readily available period of housing benefit on account. [30973]

Mr. Evans: This information is not available.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many visits his officials have made to unitary authorities to monitor the payment of housing benefit. [30969]

Mr. Evans: None.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many local authorities are making payments on account of housing benefit. [30972]

Mr. Evans: This information is not collected centrally. Regulations provide that all local authorities shall make payments on account when appropriate.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the sums paid on account of housing benefit for each authority and the average delay in completing the formal claims and estimate for each authority at the latest available date. [30974]

Mr. Evans: This information is not available.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to instruct his officials to visit unitary authorities to monitor the payments of housing benefit. [30970]

Mr. Evans: None. However, the need to visit new unitary authorities will be taken into account when planning future visits.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated annual saving from reducing the reduced earnings allowance for people with disabilities over retirement age. [30834]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) on 28 February 1996, Official Report, column 625.

Family Credit

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each of the last five years the amount claimed in respect of family credit; and if he will make a statement on the effect of the abolition of the wages council on the amount claimed. [31352]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is set out in the table.

1991–92	626
1992–93	929
1993–94	1,208
1994–95	1,441
1995–96	1,682 (estimated outturn)

Source: 1996 Departmental Report

We have no evidence to suggest that the abolition of wages councils has had a direct impact on the amount of family credit claimed.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost to public funds of increasing the Christmas bonus to regain the purchasing value which obtained when it was first introduced.[31306]

Mr. Heald: The estimated additional gross cost would be £790 million in 1996–97.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures his Department has implemented during the last 12 months to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with his Department and its executive agencies; and what progress his Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31537]

Mr. Burt: All business units have action plans covering a range of personnel procedures to encourage the recruitment, retention, development and promotion of women, such as the setting of numerical goals across the Department for improving the representation of women at middle management levels and above and self development programmes aimed specifically at women.

Women make up 68 per cent. of the Department's work force, a proportion which has not changed since 1992. The percentage of women in management positions has, however, continued to grow. The proportion of women in junior and middle management positions has increased from 51 per cent. to 58 per cent. in the past five years, and 28 per cent. of senior management positions are now held by women, an increase of 5 per cent. in the past 12 months.

National Insurance

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the total revenue raised from national insurance in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and what the figures would be if the rate had remained unchanged since April 1992. [31602]

Mr. Heald: The information requested is in the table.

Total class 1 contribution revenue for employers and employees

(£ billion)

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Actual revenue[1]	38.70	41.55	43.10
April 1992 rates[2]	37.65	39.50	41.20

[1] Figures show the amount due for each tax year and will differ slightly from the amount actually paid by employers and employees during the tax year due to the normal delays inherent in the collection system.

[2] Assumes that the contribution rates and level of contracted-out rebates in force in April 1992 remained in force from 1993–94 to 1995–96, but the lower and upper earnings limits and earnings bands for those years still apply.

Note:

Estimates of rates other class 1 have not been provided as the effect will be negligible.

Rehabilitation of Ex-offenders

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment his Department has made of the impact on the rehabilitation of ex-offenders seeking accommodation for the first time after leaving a prison institution of the change to housing benefit being paid in arrears under the Housing Benefit (General) Amendment Regulations 1996; and what consultation his Department has had with (a) the Home Office and (b) organisations representing ex-offenders on the impact of these regulations. [31884]

Mr. Roger Evans: Ex-offenders seeking accommodation in the private rented sector will be treated in exactly the same way for housing benefit purposes as any other claimant. Housing benefit will be paid in arrears in respect of all new claims made on or after 7 October 1996, rather than wholly or partly in advance as at present.

Our proposals for the change, which is expected to reduce the number of overpayments of benefit, were subject to consideration by other Departments, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department was also involved. Our proposals were, in addition, referred to the local authority associations and to the Social Security Advisory Committee, SSAC, which consulted widely with interested organisations. The SSAC report drew attention to the position of ex-offenders, but none of the several organisations concerned with the rehabilitation of ex-offenders which responded to the SSAC consultation exercise reported fears that their prospects of rehabilitation would be damaged or unduly affected by the change.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he will take to ensure that Mr. S. Sadler of 57 Central road, Rudheath, North received the regular maintenance payments due from his wife as the Child Support Agency. [32204]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The Child Support Agency has been successful in securing maintenance for Mr. Sadler. As it does in all such cases, the agency will make every effort to ensure this continues.

The chief executive, Miss Ann Chant, will write to the hon. Member separately with a further update on the details of this case.

HEALTH

Prescribing Research Unit, Leeds

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his letter of 1 April, when he expects the publication of the report of the prescribing research unit at Leeds university based on a large cohort study of general practitioners both fundholding and non-fundholding. [31201]

Mr. Malone: The report is currently in preparation. No date has been set for publication.

Nutrition

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual cost to the national health service of dietary related diseases stemming from insufficient and inappropriate nutritional intake, for each year since 1990, and give this figure as a percentage of the overall annual health care budget; and if he will make a statement. [31851]

Mr. Horam: Diseases and conditions to which nutrition is a contributory factor include coronary heart disease and stroke, obesity, osteoporosis, bowel disorders, diabetes, dental caries, and a number of cancers. The contribution of diet to these conditions is variable and information on which to base an estimate of costs is not available.

Women (Promotion)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures his Department has implemented during the last 12 months to encourage the promotion of women into senior positions with his Department and its executive agencies; and what progress his Department has made in encouraging the promotion of women over the last five years. [31538]

Mr. Horam: The Department has a plan to improve under representation of women in certain grades. Measures include the development of stock targets for women by grade, development and implementation of a comprehensive policy on flexible working patterns and development and implementation of a programme of positive action training for women. The numbers of women in management grades overall has increased since 1992 as shown in the table.

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances his Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within his own Department or its executive agencies. [31526]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health and its agencies use executive search or employment agencies to fill appointments requiring specialist skills which may not be available internally.

Skin Cancer

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual cost to the national health service of treating (a) skin cancer and (b) any other conditions resulting from over-exposure to ultra-violet light, for each year since 1990, and give this figure as a percentage of the overall annual health care budget; and if he will make a statement. [31852]

Mr. Horam: Information is not available centrally on which to base such an estimate.

Homelessness

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to tackle the specific problems of health care provision for the homeless; and if he will make a statement. [31850]

Mr. Bowis: Homeless people are entitled to the full range of health service provision and the weighted capitation formula used to calculate health authorities' allocations takes into account the number of officially homeless. From 1996–97, a new adjustment to the formula takes account of rough sleepers.

Homeless people can experience difficulty in accessing services to which they are entitled. The Department is therefore funding 26 projects in England to address this problem by providing general practitioner sessions in hostels and other places where homeless people gather. In addition, the homeless mentally ill initiative is providing a high level of care and support for rough sleepers with mental health problems in London. In February the Government announced that a further £2 million a year was being made available to expand the initiative in London and a number of other centres.

Private Patients

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many private patients in NHS pay beds underwent surgery in (a) total and (b) each chapter of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys operation short list in 1990–91 and each year since then. [31935]

Mr. Horam: The information available centrally relates to finished consultant episodes. The table shows the number of episodes where a private patient had an operation in their first episode of care within a spell in hospital, for each chapter heading of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys operation short list.

Ordinary admissions and day cases: number of first order episodes indicating that an operation has been performed on private patients, Category code 20–22, for each chapter heading of the OPCS Classification of Surgical Operations and Procedures NHS Hospitals, England, 1990–91 to 1994–95

Mental Illness

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that the Royal College of Psychiatrists publishes a consensus statement agreed with other professional groups on discharge and aftercare procedures for mentally ill patients, as recommended in 1988 by the inquiry into the care and aftercare of Miss Sharon Campbell (Cm 440). [31943]

Mr. Bowis: The agreement and publication of such a statement is a matter for the royal college and the other professional organisations.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of hospital beds which will continue to be needed for some patients for periods of over one year; and, of those, how many will be in (a) ordinary psychiatric hospitals and (b) medium secure units. [31941]

Mr. Bowis: It is the responsibility of health authorities to assess the needs of their population and to ensure that sufficient beds are available to meet those needs.

Asthma

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many new cases of asthma have been recorded so far in 1996; what were the annual figures for newly reported asthma cases for the previous five years; and if he will make a statement. [31853]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available in the form requested. However, according to data collected by the Royal College of General Practitioners, the mean weekly incidence of new episodes of asthma per 100,000 population was as follows:

1991: 46.3

1993: 50.3

1994: 49.2

1995: 40.3

1996: 38.5 (first 21 weeks)

The encouraging recent reduction in general practitioner episodes is mirrored by a fall in the number of hospital admissions and day cases.

Cystic Fibrosis

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy that health authorities should routinely screen all babies at birth for cystic fibrosis; and if he will make a statement. [31549]

Mr. Horam: A systematic review of screening for cystic fibrosis has been commissioned. The findings, which are expected in 1997, will guide decisions on the introduction of a national screening programme.

Poverty

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to incorporate ill health due to poverty in future statistics; and if he will make a statement. [31849]

Mr. Horam: Through its public health information strategy, the Department of Health has agreed a common information framework to ensure that information about the health status of the population is collected and analysed in a consistent way. That framework includes a number of socio-economic variables, to enable analysis of the association between health and socio-economic status.

Water Tower Mental Hospitals

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 30 April, Official Report, column 501, which water tower mental hospitals are currently open; and when he expects to receive information on (a) their planned closure dates and (b) the number of patients at each hospital on 31 March 1995 and 31 March 1996. [32463]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 1 April at columns 48–50. The National Health Service Executive will shortly be undertaking a further national survey of the closure of the water tower mental hospitals in England.

Breast Screening

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what factors explain the (a) fall in the total amount and (b) fall in the percentage of the total budget of the money spent by his Department under the national health service breast screening programme on screening women aged 65 years and over between 1993–94 and 1994–95. [31883]

Mr. Horam: Under the national health service breast screening programme, women aged 65 and over are not invited routinely for screening. However, some women who should be screened at 64 may not in fact be invited for screening until they have reached the age of 65. There was a fall in the number of these women invited for screening between 1993–94 and 1994–95, provisional figures. A factor which may explain the fall in 1994–95 is that more women of 64 were screened on schedule before they reached their 65th birthday.

Women aged 65 and over may continue to be screened every three years on request. The number of women requesting screening remained constant between 1993–94 and 1994–95.

Residential Care

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the percentage of people in long-term residential care who are self-funding. [32200]

Mr. Bowis: We estimate that around 25 per cent. of people in residential care currently meet their own costs in full.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the total annual cost to public funds of raising the capital disregards for long-term residential care from 1 April. [32201]

Mr. Bowis: With regard to the cost to English local authority social services departments, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) on 5 March at column 189.

The cost to the Department of Social Security of raising the capital disregards in relation to income support for residential accommodation is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the total annual cost to public funds of raising the lower and upper capital disregards for long-term residential care from £10,000 to £15,000 and from £16,000 to £21,000. [32202]

Mr. Bowis: No such estimate has been made.

AIDS Conference

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if representatives from his Department will be attending the 11th international conference on AIDS in Vancouver in July. [32203]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 29 April at column 342. In addition, the Medical Devices Agency may also be represented.

Safety of Medicines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions in (a) 1995 and (b) 1996 the United Kingdom has made written requests that the Committee on Proprietory Medicinal Products consider matters relating to the safety of medicines. [27358]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 30 April 1996]: On one occasion in 1995; there have been no such occasions in 1996.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Northern Ireland Forum

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland where the Northern Ireland forum will meet. [30837]

Mr. Ancram: The forum will meet in the Interpoint Centre, York street, Belfast.

Cattle Exports

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the cattle exported for slaughter from Northern Ireland in 1995 were (a) under six months and (b) certified as destined for EU abattoirs. [31116]

Sir John Wheeler: In 1995, no cattle under six months of age were exported for slaughter from Northern Ireland.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) pursuant to his answer of 1 April, Official Report, column 68, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31443]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, column 613, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31456]

Sir John Wheeler: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Paramilitary Arsenals

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate has been made of the scale of the IRA and loyalist paramilitary arsenals. [30884]

Sir John Wheeler: There is continuing public speculation about the nature and extent of illegal weapons holdings and supplies. However, it is not in the public interest to comment on or record information based on intelligence reporting.

School Meals

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many schoolchildren in Northern Ireland currently receive (a) free and (b) subsidised school meals; and what were the figures (i) five and (ii) 10 years ago. [32174]

Mr. Ancram: The information is provided in the following table:

Year	Pupils receiving free school meals	Pupils receiving subsidised school meals
1995[1]	83,073	99,549
1991	77,005	87,189
1986	98,233	66,600

ENVIRONMENT

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union Flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31506]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on Thursday 6 June Official Report, column 518.

Landfill Tax

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement outlining the respective roles of his Department and the new Environment Agency in implementing the landfill tax, with special reference to what new steps will be taken to prevent illegal dumping and fly tipping in the countryside, and to relieve landowners on whose property such waste is deposited from liability to pay the tax when they transport it to designated landfill sites. [31616]

Mr. Gummer: My Department is responsible for the overall regulatory framework for waste management in England and Wales. Regulations implemented on 1 May 1994 introduced a new waste management licensing system. The associated duty of care for waste came into force on 1 April 1992. The penalties that can be imposed for offences relating to waste are already severe, and these controls provide a strong regulatory framework to support the introduction of the landfill tax. My Department will also write to the courts before the start of the tax on 1 October 1996, to draw their attention to the financial gains that can be made by those who dispose of waste illegally.

The Environment Agency is the competent authority for the purposes of waste management licensing. The agency has the resources and the expertise to advise on the legal and sound management of waste, to investigate offences and to carry out enforcement action. The Government's guidance to the agency on its objectives and contribution to sustainable development, which will be laid before Parliament very shortly, will clarify its role in this area. Ministers will expect the agency to act upon its powers and to review procedures for preventing and handling cases of fly tipping.

The Government have no plans to relieve the occupiers of land on which waste is deposited illegally from liability to pay landfill tax where they dispose of the waste to licensed landfill sites.

Disabled People (Water Supplies)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance his Department gives to water companies in (a) identifying in advance and (b) providing alternative water supplies for customers with mobility problems, when due to exception circumstances, water is available only from standpipes or bowsers. [31874]

Mr. Clappison: The Department has issued two formal directions under the Water Industry Act 1991 to all water and sewerage companies whereby they are required to formulate plans to provide an essential water supply at all times and notify the relevant local authority and district health authority during water supply emergencies. The arrangements made by water companies under these provisions cover supplies to all the affected householders, with particular emphasis on providing for vulnerable members of the community, including those with mobility problems.

Disabled People (Housing)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to issue guidance to local authorities and housing associations on the maintenance of a list of their accessible properties for disabled people; and if he will make a statement. [31875]

Mr. Clappison: Paragraph 13(f) of the annex to Department of the Environment circular 10/92 "Housing and Community Care" advises local authorities to consider maintaining a record of special needs or adapted housing in their areas to help match those available against an assessment of individuals' needs. I understand that the Housing Corporation has recently commissioned research into the use of databases of adapted properties with a view to issuing advice to housing associations on good practice in this area.

Housing Associations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce legislation to provide for the compulsory inclusion of tenants on the boards of housing associations. [31983]

Mr. Clappison: The appointment of board members to housing associations is for individual associations to determine in accordance with their rules. The Government encourage associations to involve tenants in all aspects of the management of their associations, but they do not consider it appropriate to legislate for the inclusion on the board members from any single interest group.

Water Consumption

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the estimated average domestic household water consumption in each water company area (a) in the last year, (b) two years ago and (c) five years ago; [32496]

(2) what was the estimated average water consumption per household in (a) England, Wales and (b) Scotland in each year since 1986; [32497]

(3) what was the overall water consumption by water company for each of the past 10 years. [32498]

Mr. Clappison: The water delivered to each household in England and Wales over the past three years, and the number of households in each water company area, are given in the Office of Water Services' reports on the "Cost of Water Delivered and Sewage Collected". Figures prior to 1992–93 are not available on a comparable basis. Estimates and projections of household water consumption for Scotland are contained in the Scottish Office research report "Domestic Water Consumption in Scotland in 1991".

Copies of these reports are in the House Library.

Estimates of the total water put into public supply in England and Wales between 1983–84 and 1994–95 are given in the table. Individual water company estimates are available from their respective associations.

Home Energy Efficiency Scheme

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what steps he is taking to monitor the take-up of grants under the home energy efficiency scheme, following changes to eligibility criteria on 1 April; and if he will make a statement; [32042]

(2) how many claimants over the age of 60 years registered for a 100 per cent. grant under the home energy efficiency scheme before the change in eligibility criteria on 1 April. [32043]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: We receive regular reports on the operation of this successful scheme, which has helped almost 2 million vulnerable householders to keep their homes warmer with less fuel, from the company which manages it for us.

By 1 April, 372,000 applicants had registered their claims under the special arrangements we set up following the Budget statement. Between 1 April and 31 May, 112,000 grants were paid.

Opencast Coal, Sharlston

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the report on the public inquiry on the proposals for opencast coal operations in the village of Sharlston. [32261]

Sir Paul Beresford: The report of the inspector who conducted the public inquiry into the proposed opencast coal mining operations at Sharlston, West Yorkshire has been received in the Department. A decision by the Secretary of State on the case will be announced as soon as possible.

Menwith Hill Station

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action has been taken to ensure that the stormwater system at Menwith hill station meets environmental protection standards; when the last inspection was carried out, and by whom; if the previous high quantities of oil have been removed from the oil/water separators; what action has been taken to ensure that these levels will not be repeated; what centralised listing of above and underground tank locations, history, and records now exists; and what action has been taken to ensure that the management of underground petroleum oil and lubrication tanks meet necessary standards and requirements. [31951]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 10 June 1996]: I understand that the stormwater system has been refurbished and that the Environment Agency has consented to the associated discharge. An inspection of the site by the agency earlier this month indicated that the oil interceptors in the system are removing oil from stormwater and that the quantity of oil evident in the separator was not substantial. The station now keeps records of underground tanks, which are regularly maintained and inspected.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will commission an analysis of the soil, air and water at RAF Menwith Hill. [31955]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 10 June 1996]: I have no plans to do so.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Recruitment

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what use her Department and its executive agencies have made of executive search agencies or employment companies in filling vacancies within her Department or executive agencies administered by her Department during the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96; what agencies were employed; what was the cost in each case; how many staff were recruited in each case; and what was the total cost in each financial year of these contracts. [31419]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department and its executive agencies have used the following executive search agencies or employment companies to fill the following posts:

(i) St. James's Management Recruitment was used to fill the post of head of financial services branch and head of the accountancy profession for the former Department of Education group in 1994–95.

(ii) Price Waterhouse was used to fill the post of permanent secretary to the former Department of Employment group in the same year.

(iii) Korn/Ferry Carré/Orban International is currently being used to fill the post of chief executive of the Employment Service.

Details of the individual contracts concerned are commercially confidential.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much her Department spent in recruiting staff to her Department and its executive agencies during the 1994–95 and 1995–96 financial years; and how many staff were recruited in each of these years. [31404]

Mr. Squire: The Department and its executive agencies spent a total of £119,366 on staff recruitment during 1994–95, and £85, 484 on staff recruitment during 1995–96. In 1994–95, 734 permanent staff, 59 fixed-term appointees and 1,482 casual staff were recruited by the Department and its executive agencies. In 1995–96, 212 permanent staff, 284 fixed-term appointees and 4,227 casual staff were recruited.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in what circumstances her Department or its executive agencies uses an executive search or employment agency to recruit staff in preference to using personnel staff within her own Department or its executive agencies. [31532]

Mr. Squire: The Department uses executive search agencies primarily to fill senior vacancies. Once a decision has been made to fill such a vacancy by open competition, the decision whether to use an executive search agency is taken on a case-by-case basis, depending on the nature of the post, the type of person being sought and whether advertisement alone would produce a satisfactory field of candidates. For members of the senior civil service, the Department follows advice in "Guidance on Civil Service Commissioners' Recruitment to Senior Posts", a procedural guide to Departments produced by the civil service commissioners.

Apart from occasional use of employment agencies to provide agency staff, other recruitment is handled by internal personnel staff and line managers involving the civil service recruitment and assessment services where appropriate.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1), pursuant to her answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 433, how much her Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31464]

(2), pursuant to her answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 484, how much her Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31462]

Mr. Robin Squire: More than £450, which is the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

School Meals

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many local education authorities have awarded their school meals contracts to Rentokil. [32074]

Mrs. Gillan: The Department does not collect this information centrally.

Student Loans Company

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make it her policy that answers to parliamentary questions that are referred to the chief executive of the Student Loans Company to answer are published in the Official Report; and if she will make a statement. [31492]

Mr. Forth: Arrangements for publishing chief executive letters responding to parliamentary questions in the Official Report apply only to the next steps agencies and Defence agencies. The Student Loans Company is a non-departmental public body—NDPB. There is no approval by the House authorities for broadening the scope of the Official Report to include letters from chief executives of NDPBs. Copies of replies from NDPB chief executives are, however, placed in the House of Commons Library.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools voted to become grant maintained during each financial year since 1993–94; and, in each case, what proportion of parental ballots ended in a yes vote. [31844]

Mrs. Gillan: The information requested is given in the table:

	1993–94		1994–95		1995–96
	Number of ballots	Number (proportion) of yes votes	Number of ballots	Number (proportion) of yes votes	Number of ballots	Number (proportion) of yes votes

Secondary	171	107 (63 per cent.)	43	13 (30 per cent.)	31	13 (42 per cent.)

Mr Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools voted to become grant maintained during the academic years 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1995–96, and in each case, what proportion of parental ballots ended in a "yes" vote. [31843]

Mrs. Gillan: The information requested is given in the tables:

	1992–93
	Number of ballots	Number (proportion) of yes votes
Primary	310	252 (81 per cent.)
Secondary	392	291 (74 per cent.)

Local Education Authorities (Delegation)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what (a) mechanism and (b) requirement exists for schools to be consulted by their local education authorities over the level of delegation within the local management of schools scheme. [31838]

Mr. Squire: The precise level of delegation to schools in any local education authority—(LEA)—is not a matter upon which consultation is required, although an LEA would be required to consult upon a proposal to amend any scheme provision which sets a minimum delegation requirement. The method by which an LEA consults schools on changes to local management of schools schemes is for the authority itself to determine.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the items of local education authority expenditure on schools that her Department considers impracticable or undesirable for delegation as stated in the 1996 departmental report; on what criteria each is considered impracticable or undesirable for delegation; and if she will make a statement. [31834]

Mr. Squire: Items excluded from the potential schools budget—PSB—are conveniently listed in schedule 1 to the Education (School Financial Statements) (Prescribed Particulars etc.) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995 No 208). Reasons for their exclusion were set out in part 4 of the Department's circular 2/94, except in the case of three items, the removal of which from the PSB was the subject of subsequent decisions. These items are: expenditure on inspections carried out by local education authorities for the Office for Standards in Education, which self-evidently cannot be delegated to schools; expenditure on the insurance of LEAs against liability in negligence, which it seemed reasonable to place on the same footing as governors' liability insurance; and expenditure on provision for ethnic minority pupils, much of which was previously excluded from the PSB by virtue of being supported by section 11 grant. The Government have been reviewing policy on delegation, and their conclusions will be set out in the forthcoming White Paper on self-government for schools.

School Funding

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each local education authority in England the percentage of the potential schools budget which has been delegated in the aggregated schools budget in each year since 1990, ranked according to the highest levels of delegation. [31837]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested for the financial years 1994–95 to 1996–97 is shown in the table. Information on earlier years is contained in the answer given on 5 July 1993 to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), Official Report, columns 16–20.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the representations her Department has received (a) for and (b) against increasing the minimum proportion of the potential schools budget which must be delegated to school governing bodies by local education authorities; and if she will make a statement. [31833]

Mr. Squire: We discuss all aspects of local management of schools—LMS—with a range of interests from time to time. In particular, the Department has held meetings in recent weeks with representatives from local authority associations, chief education officers, teacher associations, GM organisations and other national bodies, about LMS delegation levels, among other things. The Government will set out their policy on LMS delegation in the forthcoming White Paper on self-government for schools.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools voted to become grant maintained during each calendar year since 1993; and, in each case, what proportion of parental ballots ended in a yes vote. [31845]

Mrs. Gillan: The information requested is given in the table:

	1993 Number of ballots	1993 Number (proportion) of yes votes	1994 Number of ballots	1994 Number (proportion) of yes votes	1995 Number of ballots	1995 Number (proportion) of yes votes
Primary	308	239 (78 per cent.)	130	83 (64 per cent)	56	35 (63 per cent.)
Secondary	237	169 (71 per cent.)	70	26 (37 per cent.)	30	14 (47 per cent.)

National Curriculum

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many appeals, by local education authority areas, have been made by parents to date about failures to deliver the national curriculum in schools. [32045]

Mr. Paice: To date, the Department has collected information on formal complaints about failure to comply with the national curriculum for the school years 1989–90, 1990–91 and 1991–92 in the case of local education authority-maintained schools, and 1993–94 in the case of both LEA-maintained and grant-maintained schools. The numbers, where supplied, are as follows. There were nil returns for 75 LEAs across all years. The data do not distinguish parents from other complainants.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many letters she has received in the past year from parents failing to obtain a place for their child in the school of their choice; what were the figures in each of the last five years; and what advice she offers such parents. [31916]

Mrs. Gillan: The Department receives many inquiries from parents about school admissions, both in writing and by telephone. No central register of such inquiries is kept. Parents who have failed to secure a place for their child in the school of their choice are advised of their statutory right to an independent appeal.
